Provisional Record

Eighty-first Session, Geneva, 1994

Note for the delegates

The Secretary-General of the Conference presents his compliments to the delegates and submits for their information the following note concerning the work of the Conference, dealing with:

A. Material arrangements.
B. Procedure.
C. Subjects to be discussed by the Conference.
D. Entertainment during the Conference.

A. Material arrangements

Place of meeting

The necessary information concerning the place of meeting is contained in the Guide for Delegates, which will be supplied by the Distribution Service (in the entrance hall) to members of delegations.

Full particulars of the layout of the premises are given in the Guide, and in the interests of the smooth running of the Conference, delegates are requested to read the Guide carefully and keep it for reference.

The main entrance is situated on the floor below the Conference floor, and members of delegations will enter by the door on the right-hand side of the Assembly block (Door No. 13).

Duration of meeting

The Conference will open on Tuesday, 7 June 1994, at 10 a.m., and is expected to continue until 24 June.

Registration of delegations Quorum

On entering the Conference premises, delegates who have not already sent their registration forms should, if necessary, obtain such forms at the Information Desk and hand them in without delay to the Information Desk duly completed and signed.

The quorum is determined by the Credentials Committee on the basis of the number of delegates registered. It is therefore important that accredited delegates attending the Conference should register personally without delay, in order that the quorum may, from the beginning of the session, accurately reflect the composition of the Conference.

The information asked for on the registration form will also be required by the Secretariat of the Conference for the purpose of arranging for the distribution of documents, letters, invitations, etc., during the session and for the delivery of documents that have to be forwarded to members of delegations after the Conference is over. All members of delegations, in whatever capacity they are attending the Conference, and observers, are therefore asked to give the required information on the registration form supplied to them.

Identification cards (coded badges)

The identification cards issued to members of delegations upon their registration will be coded badges to be used for the purposes of voting, which will be conducted electronically (see section entitled "Electronic voting system").

In this connection, delegations may wish to note that members duly authorized to vote on behalf of titular delegates, either for the entire duration of the session or for a specific vote, must use their own badges for this purpose.

Participants are requested to note that strict security measures will be enforced at the entrances to the Conference premises and the Assembly Hall. The ushers on duty will ask them to produce their identification cards. Members of delegations and observers not already in possession of their identification cards should apply for them without delay to the Information Desk.

Seating arrangements for plenary sittings

Delegations of member States represented at the Conference will be accommodated as usual on the floor of the Assembly Hall and seated in the French alphabetical order of countries. Owing to the fact that the number of seats available on the floor of the Hall is barely sufficient to accommodate the delegations of member States, observers of non-member States and representatives of intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations may of necessity have to be accommodated in the fifth-floor galleries of the Assembly Hall.

List of members of delegations

A trilingual provisional list of members of delegations is distributed in time for the opening of the session. This list gives, in French alphabetical order of countries, the names and designations of the delegates and advisers as indicated in the official credentials and the names of representatives of the United Nations, specialized agencies and other official international organizations and the names of representatives or registered observers of non-governmental international organizations. A revised provisional list and a final list of members of delegations will be issued subsequently.

Programme of meetings and Daily Bulletin

Delegates may obtain information concerning the programme of the following morning's meetings by dialling the following telephone numbers each evening after 10 p.m.

English:	917 69 82
French:	917 69 83
Spanish:	917 68 44

The complete programme for each day will be published in the Daily Bulletin, which will be available at the Distribution Service from 8 a.m.

The programme of meetings will also be posted up on special notice boards in the entrance hall of the Palais des Nations and on Floor R.3 (near the delegates' bar) of the ILO building.

No room, whether in the Palais des Nations or in the ILO building, may be used for meetings without prior authorization of the Chief of the Secretariat Services (office A-577, telephone 76834).

Provisional Record

A Provisional Record, giving reports of all the speeches or interpretations at plenary sittings of the Conference, the texts of committee reports and other official documents of the Conference, is published in English, French and Spanish.

Delegates who wish to have corrections made to the report of their speeches as printed should communicate these to the International Labour Office (Conference Record Service) in writing not later than ten days after the close of the Conference. Such corrections will be published as an addendum to the record of the Conference.

For the sake of economy, the press-run of the Provisional Record is limited. Participants in the Conference should therefore keep their copies and refrain from asking for additional copies. As decided by the Conference in 1977, the issues reproducing debates in plenary sitting will appear after an interval which may be of up to two working days during the first part of the Conference. Thereafter, the Provisional Record of the plenary sittings of a given day will be distributed one and a half days later, during the afternoon of the following day.

Electronic voting system

Votes during plenary sittings of the Conference will be taken by means of the electronic voting system introduced last year. This system will also be used for the vote on the priority of resolutions.

The electronic voting system may be used for the three types of voting procedures provided for in the Standing Orders of the Conference: by show of hands, by a record vote and by secret ballot. The "voting stations" made available to delegates or persons empowered to vote on their behalf are equipped with a screen and a keyboard. The coded badge issued to them upon registration makes it possible to operate the voting station. When inserted into the voting station, it identifies the person voting and indicates the language used by this person.

When a vote is to be held, the subject to be voted on as well as the method of voting (show of hands, record vote or secret ballot) are displayed on the screen of the voting station. Instructions regarding the next steps to be taken will also appear on the screen.

Vote by show of hands: It should be noted first of all that this type of vote will, strictly speaking, no longer be "by show of hands", but will differ from a record vote in that no record will be published as to how each delegate voted. Once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required.

Record vote: Once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. These indications will subsequently be published together with a list of the delegates who have voted, showing how they have voted.

Secret ballot: Once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. There will be absolutely no access possible to individual votes: each voting station will be equipped with a plastic cover in order to ensure the secrecy of the vote and there will be no record of how the delegates have voted.

In all three cases it is important that delegates should have previously decided whether they or another member of their delegation will exercise their right to vote in a given case and that these persons use their own badges. Where more than one vote is nevertheless cast on behalf of a delegate at two different moments or from two different places, only the first vote will be recognized, whether made by the delegate, by a substitute delegate or by an adviser who has received a specific written authorization to that end. A standard form for this purpose will, as in previous years, be at the disposal of delegates at the Information Desk which is situated in the entrance hall of the Assembly Building. Delegates may also obtain these forms at the Secretariat of the Credentials Committee or at the office of the Clerk of the Conference. These specific authorizations, which were formerly handed in to the Clerk's office, must henceforth be submitted to the Credentials Committee Secretariat preferably the day before the vote and, in any event, at least one hour before voting begins.

The names of titular and deputy Government members of Conference committees should be communicated to the Clerk's office in order to allow those members to express their vote in committees.

An information session to familiarize delegates with the functioning of the electronic voting system will be organized at the beginning of the Conference. The time, date and place of this session will be announced in the Daily Bulletin.

B. Procedure

The procedure of the Conference is governed by the Constitution of the Organization and by the Standing Orders, which are reproduced in the publication entitled Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference (obtainable from the Distribution Service). The following brief outline of the procedure may be helpful to members of delegations.

Group meetings

The Government, Employers' and Workers' groups will meet separately on the eve of the official opening of the Conference to elect their own officers. They will make proposals for the nomination of the three Vice-Presidents of the Conference, as well as for the nomination of the members of the Selection Committee, the Credentials Committee and of the various committees which will be constituted by the Conference. Only accredited delegates and their advisers may be so nominated. Information concerning the manner in which these nominations should be made is given to each group during its meeting.

Opening

On the first day the Conference meets in plenary sitting. The session is opened by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office. The Conference will then elect its President and nominate its three Vice-Presidents. In accordance with paragraph 3 of article 25 of the Standing Orders, at its first plenary sitting the Conference will also establish various committees and appoint their members on the basis of proposals made by the groups. The general debate in plenary sitting will begin at 3 p.m. on the same day and the Selection Committee will meet at 6 p.m.

Commemorative ceremony

On the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, a commemorative ceremony will be held at 11.30 a.m. on Tuesday, 7 June, immediately after the opening ceremony of the Conference.

Plenary sittings

The times of the plenary sittings are shown in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice boards.

The attention of delegates is called to the resolution concerning freedom of speech of non-governmental delegates to ILO meetings, which was adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 54th Session (June 1970). In this resolution the Conference affirms the importance it attaches to the application of article 40 of the Constitution in such manner that the right of Employers' and Workers' delegates to the Conference to express themselves freely on questions within the competence of the ILO is completely safeguarded.

Committee meetings

The committees will begin their work on Wednesday, 8 June in the morning.

The time and place at which the various committees will meet will be announced in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice boards.

The procedure of committees is governed by Section H of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the text of which is contained in the publication entitled Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

In committees dealing with the items on the agenda, equal representation is given to the three groups in the Conference – Government, Employers and Workers. This is achieved by a weighting system.

At its first sitting each committee elects a Chairman. It also elects two Vice-Chairmen, chosen one from each of the other groups. The Reporter and Drafting Committee are also appointed, either at the beginning or at a later stage of the committee's work. Separate meetings of the Government, Employers' and Workers' members of the committee may be held. As far as possible these meetings are announced in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice boards but, to ensure that they are informed, members of committees should keep in touch with the Officers of their group.

Members of delegations wishing to speak at committee meetings should send their names up to the Chairman or secretariat of the committee (especially at the early meetings, it is desirable to send up names instead of merely "catching the eye" of the Chairman). Speakers are called on in the order in which their names are received. All speeches made in English, French or Spanish will be interpreted into the other two languages; interpretation inter alia from and into Arabic, Chinese, German and Russian is also given as required.

The work of committee secretariats is facilitated if members always sit in the same places.

Amendments to proposals before a committee must be handed in to the secretariat of the committee in writing.

In the interest of smooth and speedy working, members of committees are requested to make their speeches as brief as possible.

Members of committees who are not already in possession of the reports under discussion by their committee can obtain copies from the Distribution Service. Other documents (e.g. amendments) are supplied by the committee secretariat.

Space permitting, the public is admitted to committee meetings, unless a committee decides or the Standing Orders provide otherwise.

Committee reports

The report of each committee is prepared by the Reporter and submitted in draft in the first instance to the officers of the Committee and then to the committee itself. With the approval of the report the committee's work comes to an end. The report is then published in the Provisional Record and is considered by the Conference in plenary sitting; the time is announced in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice boards. Amendments to the committee's proposals for consideration by the Conference must be given in writing to the Clerk of the Conference. In the case of a proposed Convention or Recommendation, after the committee's proposals and any amendments thereto have been discussed and voted on by the Conference in plenary sitting, the text is referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference to be put into final form. The text prepared by the Drafting Committee is then published in the Provisional Record and the final record vote is taken in plenary sitting at a time which is announced in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice boards.

Members of delegations who are in any doubt or difficulty should not hesitate to apply to the officers of their group or to the secretariat of the committee.

C. Subjects to be discussed by the Conference

Agenda

Standing items

I. Oral report of the Chairman of the Governing Body and report of the Director-General.
II. Programme and budget and other financial questions.
III. Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

Items placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body

IV. Part-time work (second discussion).
V. Safety and Health in Mines (first discussion).
VI. The role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets (general discussion).
VII. Review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa

With regard to the second item on the agenda, the Conference will be called upon to examine Report II: Information concerning the programme and budget for 1994-95 and other financial and administrative questions, as well as any further related matters that may be brought to its attention by the Governing Body.

Discussion of the oral report of the Chairman of the Governing Body and of the report of the Director-General

In accordance with article 12 of its Standing Orders, as amended by the Conference at its 80th Session, the Conference will discuss a report on the work of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office which will be orally presented by its Chairman. A report by the Director-General of the Office is also submitted to the Conference: the first part of this report is entitled Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: an ILO agenda; the second part is devoted to the activities of the ILO during the preceding financial period.

The discussion of the oral report of the Chairman of the Governing Body and of the Director-General's report will begin in the afternoon of Tuesday, 7 June. In order to ensure the smooth working of the Conference, it is most desirable that a number of speakers should be prepared to speak early in the discussion.

Delegates who wish to take part in the discussion are requested to give their names to the office of the Clerk of the Conference (room A-571, telephone 76828) as early as possible and in any event before the closing day for the list of speakers which will be fixed by the Selection Committee at its first sitting. They are requested to hand in eight copies of their speeches for the use of the interpreters and the Conference Record Service. A ninth copy is requested from delegates who wish their speeches to be made available to the press and radio.

Time-limit for speeches

Article 14, paragraph 6, of the Conference Standing Orders sets at 10 minutes the time-limit of speeches in the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Ministers attending the Conference and delegates who wish to take part in that discussion will certainly wish to bear this provision in mind so as to avoid the risk of being asked by the President to resume their seats before they have concluded.

Other business

1. Standing Orders. The Conference will have before it proposals for the amendment of its Standing Orders submitted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office. The text of the proposals appears in the Provisional Record, No. 2.

2. Resolutions. The texts of the draft resolutions submitted for consideration by the Conference in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders appear in the Provisional Record, No. 1.

D. Entertainment during the Conference

Before deciding on a date and making arrangements for receptions, delegates should contact the Protocol Service (room A-525, telephone 76862), which will be pleased to help with any necessary information and advice.

The General Conference of the International Laour Organization,

Recalling the Economic and Social Council resoltions 1991/70, 1992/60, and 1993/56 on the need to armonize and improve United Nations informatics ystems for optimal utilization and accessibility by all tates,

Noting with appreciation that the ILO is the first Jnited Nations agency to computerize the holdings f its libraries,

Mindful of the importance of the widest possible issemination of the ILO's Conventions, publications nd research work amongst all its constituents:

1. Calls upon the ILO to play a more active role as member of the International Computing Centre ICC) towards implementation of the relevant COSOC resolutions in consultation with its memers, including Permanent Missions and workers' nd employers' secretariats.

2. Reiterates the urgent need for representatives f States to be closely consulted and actively associted on the question of informatics within the ILO, o that the specific needs of States as internal endsers can be given due priority.

3. Calls upon the ILO to consider harmonizing its atabase system with other database systems in the Jnited Nations.

4. Requests the Director-General of the Interational Labour Office to report on the progress nade in this direction, in accordance with the Ecoomic and Social Council resolutions 1991/70, 1992/60 nd 1993/56, to the next session of the International abour Conference.

esolution concerning the commemoration of the 75th aniversary of the International Labour Organization, subitted by the following Employers' delegates: Mr. Cortina egarreta (Chile); Mr. Hultin (Finland); Mr. Lacasa Aso; liss Mackie (United Kingdom); Mr. Noakes (Australia); Ir. Oechslin (France); Mr. Owuor (Kenya); Mr. Pierides Cyprus); Mr. Thüsing (Germany); and Mr. Tsujino (Japan)

The General Conference of the International Laour Organization,

Commemorating the 75th anniversary of the Interational Labour Organization, which was established by Part XIII of the Treaty of Peace signed at Versailles on 28 June 1919,

Commemorating also the 50th anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration concerning the aims and purposes of the International Labour Organization, adopted at Philadelphia on 10 May 1944 and annexed to the Constitution,

Recognizing that in the 50 years since the Declaration of Philadelphia was adopted the world has undergone considerable change in many aspects of international and national life,

Considering that all institutions need to be reviewed from time to time in order to ensure that their respective missions remain relevant to the needs of their members in a changing environment, and that their structures and methods are the most appropriate for such missions,

Noting that other organizations which the world community has set up, notably the United Nations, have embarked on a reassessment of their roles and structures in order to adapt themselves to developments in the world,

Considering that the ILO, with its unique tripartite nature and its specific mandate in the social and labour field, has an important role to play in the United Nations system,

Noting that the Report of the Director-General to the present session of the Conference, entitled Defending values, promoting change, addresses these issues, as well as the contributions made by several others on the same theme,

Reaffirming continued faith in and commitment to the fundamental principles and values upon which the ILO was founded, and recognizing the new relevance they acquire in today's world,

Recognizing the need to review the objectives, priorities, strategies, procedures and structures of the Organization in order to optimize its usefulness to its membership in the light of developments up to now, and to prepare it to remain relevant and useful in the future;

1. Calls upon member States, employers, workers and their respective organizations to contribute to a renewal of the role, structures and activities of the International Labour Organization with a view to improving and optimizing the benefits it offers to its constituents in the light of changes in the world.

2. Calls upon the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to review the priorities and methods of the Organization, taking account of the discussion of the Director-General's Report to the present session of the Conference, with a view to improving its capacity to meet its objectives and to be of service to governments, employers and workers in all its member States. In particular, the review should, where necessary:

(a) re-evaluate its means of action;

(b) review its practices and procedures; and

(c) develop a policy to improve its image.

Resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation, submitted by the Government delegations of Belgium, Canada, Chile, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Ireland, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and United States

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

On the occasion of the milestone of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization,

Reaffirming the principles and fundamental values upon which the ILO was founded and which retain their relevance in the world today,

Recognizing that the world has undergone considerable social and economic changes in recent years, and anticipating that these will continue,

Considering that all institutions and structures need to be reviewed from time to time in order to ensure that their activities remain relevant to the needs of their members in a changing environment,

Noting that the Governing Body of the ILO has already taken steps to improve the functioning of the International Labour Conference and the regional conferences, and to improve its own methods of work,

Welcoming the ideas and the proposals of the Director-General on possible future orientations and activities of the ILO in his report to the 81st Session of the Conference, entitled Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda,

Noting with interest the recent contributions of several governments and of the social partners to the discussion of the ILO's future;

1. Calls upon member States, employers and workers and their respective organizations to contribute to a renewal of the role, structures and means of action of the International Labour Organization with a view to improving and optimizing the benefits it offers to its constituents in the light of changes in the world.

2. Requests the Director-General of the International Labour Office to develop further the ideas in his report, in response to its discussion by the Conference, at future sessions of the Governing Body.

3. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office:

(a) to examine the ideas and proposals of the Director-General with a view to revitalizing the ILO, adapting its means of action to the changing world environment and increasing its effectiveness;

(b) to keep the Conference informed of conclusions it has reached or actions it has taken.

Resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the promotion of international labour law, submitted by the following Workers' delegates: Mr. Ba (Burkina Faso); Mr. Melgarejo (Uruguay); Mr. Ould Brahim (Mauritania); and Mr. Peirens (Belgium)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Considering the recurrent structural recession taking place in the world economy today,

Observing that human labour is increasingly subject to competition, which entails the risk of social dumping and, consequently, a general decline in social justice,

Believing that, in this context and particularly on the occasion of the Organization's 75th anniversary, more deliberate measures should be taken to establish international labour legislation within the spirit of the Constitution of the Organization,

Aware that this objective may be attained in a number of countries only gradually and in the long term, on the basis of ILO standards and with the Organization's technical assistance,

Convinced that non-protectionist social clauses in trade and cooperation agreements may well be used as vehicles for progress towards the objective of international labour legislation;

1. Invites governments:

(a) in the spirit of the Declaration of Philadelphia, to place human and social concerns at the centre of all development policies so that they respect the principles of equity, social justice and solidarity, and contribute to a fair distribution of income, wealth, employment, effort and sacrifice;

(b) to ratify and apply ILO Conventions, in particular those concerning the fundamental rights of workers;

(c) to strengthen tripartism at the national level, so that trade union organizations may participate as equal partners in the formulation of national economic and social policy;

(d) to encourage and strengthen the participation of women in social and political life.

2. Calls upon all governments to ratify five Conventions on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO.

3. Invites governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organizations to give their support to the establishment of non-protectionist social clauses and positive provisions, through which the contracting parties undertake to adopt the most appropriate measures for ensuring the observance of minimum standards set by the ILO, in particular Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, 138, 100 and 111, 29 and 105.

4. Requests the constituents of the ILO to:

(a) reaffirm and respect their commitment to the ideals of the ILO and to translate this commitment into practical action to improve the lives of workers and the most disadvantaged members of society;

(b) to spare no effort to assign social objectives to economic activities.

5. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

(a) assist governments, within the framework of the ILO's technical cooperation activities, in removing obstacles to the ratification of Conventions and Recommendations;

(b) intensify cooperation with the international financial institutions, with a view to rapidly reaching a world social contract;

(c) become involved in the formulation and implementation of any social clause which may be introduced in international trade and cooperation, as well as in the application and supervisory mechanisms and procedures related to such a clause.

Resolution concerning ILO action in preparation for the World Summit for Social Development, submitted by the following Workers' delegates: Mr. Ba (Burkina Faso); Mr. Melgarejo (Uruguay); Mr. Ould Brahim (Mauritania); and Mr. Peirens (Belgium)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Considering the recurrent structural recession taking place in the world economy today,

Considering also the repercussions of this recession on employment, the increase of all forms of exclusion and poverty, as well as the rise in migration for economic reasons,

Observing the increasing dualism in national societies as well as in the resulting world economic order,

Considering the structural adjustment policies promoted by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank and their social consequences,

Taking into consideration the latest developments in world trade, in particular the agreement reached by the Uruguay Round, as well as the establishment of the World Trade Organization,

Recalling furthermore that the Declaration of Philadelphia proclaimed the concept whereby human labour cannot be considered a commodity,

Observing nevertheless that in fact human labour has become subject to increasingly severe competition, which entails unprecedented rivalry between the centres of production, a decline in efficiency, as well as a reduction in the coverage of labour law and social rights,

Stressing the importance and significance of tripartism, particularly within the ILO, for the consideration, analysis and establishment of balanced standards, and at national level, in the ratification and application of these standards,

Believing that the ILO should be fully associated with any measure which is likely to have an impact on its areas of competence,

Taking into consideration the convening by the United Nations of a World Summit for Social Development in 1995 and the corresponding measures and work already undertaken by the ILO;

1. Invites governments to:

(a) respect the commitments made upon becoming members of the ILO, in particular the obligation to promote social justice;

(b) ratify and apply ILO Conventions;

(c) fully guarantee the respect, within the United Nations, of the competence and prerogatives of the ILO in the social and economic spheres, both during the process of making decisions and in the application of these decisions;

(d) establish in the economic and social decision-making procedures of their countries a tripartite system such as that which characterizes the functioning of the ILO;

(e) ensure the tripartite nature of their representation at the World Summit for Social Development in 1995.

2. Invites governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organizations to:

(a) promote the social inclusion of all citizens by promoting the creation of productive employment as far as possible;

(b) institute or stimulate the participation of their populations, in particular workers, in the formulation of policy, especially in the economic and social spheres;

(c) prepare for the World Summit for Social Development in 1995, taking into consideration the competence, mandate and work of the ILO, and in particular the position adopted by its Governing Body at its 258th Session in November 1993;

(d) advocate respect for social justice in international trade mechanisms;

(e) promote the insertion of non-protectionist social clauses in trade and cooperation contracts, under the supervision of the ILO.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

(a) ensure that new ways and means are found to take account of the social dimension in the formulation and implementation of structural adjustment policies;

(b) become involved in the formulation and implementation of any non-protectionist social clause which may be introduced in world trade and in international cooperation, as well as in the application and supervisory mechanisms and procedures related to such a clause;

(c) become involved, on the occasion of the World Summit for Social Development in 1995, in the preparation and promulgation of a World Social Charter which should be based in a coherent and complete manner on the principles and Conventions of the ILO, and which should serve as a basis for action for the United Nations system, as well as for cooperation agencies, and trade and economic agencies.

Resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism and the universal application of fundamental rights in the face of enterprise networks and economic interdependence, submitted by the following Workers' delegates: Mr. Ba (Burkina Faso); Mr. Melgarejo (Uruguay); Mr. Ould Brahim (Mauritania); and Mr. Peirens (Belgium)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling the preamble of the Constitution of the ILO which states that the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions [of workers] in their own countries, Recalling that the Declaration of Philadelphia highlights the essential function of tripartism and the need for the universal application of social and labour rights,

Noting the Report of the Director-General to the present session of the Conference, entitled Defending values, promoting change, which indicates in particular that "even the governments of the most powerful States are finding it hard to pursue autonomous economic and social policies successfully owing to the domestic repercussions of decisions taken by extra-territorial actors, and particularly by the networks of enterprises that can easily shift their production sites across borders or oceans to cut costs and maximize profits",

Considering that the transition to a market economy in a number of countries, globalization and the interdependence of enterprises, enterprise networks, investments and capital flows give rise to new centres of decision-making which are partially or totally outside the framework of tripartism and the consultation procedures advocated by the ILO,

Considering that these developments entail adverse consequences for the effectiveness of labour legislation, as well as for tripartite relations at the national and international levels,

Noting with great concern the rapid expansion of free export zones in which international labour standards are often not applied or applied only very partially, as well as the excessive number of tax and other exemptions granted in these zones which are likely to undermine the stable financing of social protection systems,

Noting that certain enterprise networks have recently adopted binding codes of conduct for all their subsidiaries, co-contractors and subcontractors,

Taking into consideration the convening by the United Nations of a World Summit for Social Development in 1995, as well as the steps taken and the work already done by the ILO in this regard:

1. Requests all the ILO's constituents to:

(a) take every opportunity to strengthen tripartism at the national, supranational and international levels;

(b) promote effectively the universal application of international labour standards by giving high priority to the principles enshrined in the Constitution and the basic human rights Conventions;

(c) undertake to ensure the respect of international labour standards, including those concerning social protection, in their entire national territory and in every sector, including export-processing zones or sectors.

2. Invites employers' organizations and enterprises to:

(a) promote actively the application of international labour standards, in particular through the widespread adoption of internal codes of conduct and binding contractual clauses in relation to their subsidiaries, co-contractors and subcontractors;

(b) involve workers' organizations and workers in the evaluation and monitoring of codes of conduct and contractual clauses.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

(a) strengthen the presence of the ILO and of its guiding principles and objectives within international and supranational economic, financial and trade organizations;

(b) encourage enterprises and enterprise networks to adhere explicitly to the standards, principles and objectives of the ILO, through the establishment of model codes of conduct or model contractual clauses which are binding for all the entities of the network or group.

Resolution calling upon the ILO to resist the introduction of the social clause in international trade and to review ILO standards, submitted by the Government delegations of Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines, Singapore and Thailand

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling the ILO's objectives as set out in the Preamble of its Constitution to contribute to lasting peace through the promotion and development of social justice which can only be achieved through economic growth and job creation,

Expressing concern at the serious problem of unemployment facing the developing and developed countries,

Expressing the importance of free trade for economic growth and employment creation,

Recognizing the importance of promoting national development through job creation and better employment prospects, particularly for those who have been deprived of opportunities to improve their economic and social well-being,

Noting with concern that developed countries are increasingly resorting to protectionist measures to restrict the free flow of trade and investments, which will lead to economic stagnation and more serious unemployment in both the developed and developing countries,

Noting the attempts to use ILO standards as a vehicle of protectionism to restrict the free flow of trade and to pressure developing countries to adhere to rigid standards as a condition for market access,

Expressing grave concern that some developed countries and International Trade Secretariats are attempting to introduce social clauses into international trade agreements to restrict market access, which would have adverse consequences on the employment opportunities of workers in the developing countries,

Emphasizing that ASEAN is not opposed to the application of ILO labour standards and is committed to improving the economic and social well-being of its workers, but is concerned with the rigid imposition of labour standards and the use of rigid standards to stifle free trade and economic development,

Noting that many ILO standards which are mainly based on norms, values and aspirations of developed countries are not appropriate to the different economic, cultural and social conditions of developing countries and their divergent needs, and that such out-dated standards do not reflect the prevailing economic and technological conditions in developing countries,

Recalling the ASEAN Resolution tabled at the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference which called for the ILO immediately to review and update certain labour standards to permit their flexible and fair implementation.

Welcoming with appreciation the concern of the Director-General of the ILO in his Report to the 81st Session of the Conference, entitled Defending values, promoting change, which supports the updating of standards and the review of certain recent Conventions which have not been ratified because their provisions are too rigid;

1. Calls upon the ILO to resist attempts to link the social clause to international trade.

2. Appeals to ILO constituents to support efforts for the flexible and fair implementation of ILO standards to reflect the dynamic socio-economic changes resulting from the globalization of the economy and the needs of developing countries.

3. Requests the Director-General of the ILO:

(a) On the occasion of the 75th anniversary to carry out a fundamental review of out-dated standards as a follow-up to his Report and recommendations, taking into account the different norms and needs of both developed and developing countries;

(b) To take into account in such review the concern of developing countries expressed in operative paragraph 1 above, and to oppose any linkage of ILO standards and the social clause with international trade and market access;

(c) To report his findings to the Conference within two years from the adoption of this resolution.

Resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development, submitted by the following Workers' delegates: Ms. Aerenlund (Denmark); Mr. Blondel (France); Mr. Brett (United Kingdom); Ms. Buverud Pedersen (Norway); Mr. Doucouré (Mali); Mr. Douglas (New Zealand); Mr. Edström (Sweden); Mrs. Engelen-Kefer (Germany); Mr. Falbr (Czech Republic); Mr. Gray (United States); Mr. Itoh (Japan); Mr. Krzaklewski (Poland); Mr. Lettieri (Italy); Mr. Maitland (Australia); Mr. Mendoza (Philippines); Mr. Mukasa (Uganda); Mr. Parrot (Canada); Mr. Sánchez Madariaga (Mexico); Mr. Sibanda (Zimbabwe); Mr. Sundaram (Sri Lanka); Mr. Tapiola (Finland); Ms. Van de Burg (Netherlands); and Mr. Verzetnitsch (Austria)[*]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Welcoming the convening by the United Nations General Assembly of the World Summit for Social Development in Denmark in 1995,

Underlining the critical importance of the struggle against unemployment, poverty and social exclusion which have been chosen as the Summit's core issues,

Recognizing the urgent need for a major initiative by the international community to tackle the global social crisis, and the opportunity that the Summit offers in this respect,

Considering that the core issues to be examined by the Summit are central to the mandate of the ILO, which therefore has primary responsibility and competence in its preparation, conduct, and follow-up,

Stressing the need for tripartite input and representation at all stages of the Summit process,

Noting the work accomplished by the Governing Body Working Party on the World Summit for Social Development and the inputs by the ILO Secretariat to the preparation of the Summit,

Considering that the informal tripartite meeting on employment held on 10 June in the framework of this session of the Conference should significantly advance the principles and objectives of the ILO in respect of the Summit:

1. Invites all member States and, where appropriate, workers' and employers' organizations:

(a) to commit themselves to ensuring the success of the Summit and to adopting and implementing a declaration and programme of action which will address effectively the social evils of unemployment, poverty and social exclusion;

(b) to promote actively the practice of tripartism in the Summit process by:

  (i) involving fully trade unions and employers' organizations in national preparatory mechanisms for the Summit;

  (ii) including trade union and employers' representatives in national delegations at meetings of the Summit Preparatory Committee and the Summit itself;

  (iii) making practical arrangements for substantial active participation by trade union and employers' representatives at the Summit;

(c) to ensure that the primary competence of the ILO regarding the core themes is fully recognized in the continuing preparation, conduct and follow-up of the summit.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to continue to make the necessary provisions for a full ILO input to the Summit process;

(b) to take all opportunities to promote tripartite participation in that process;

(c) to take fully into account the need for the ILO to play the leading role in follow-up to the Summit when preparing his programme and budget proposals for 1996-97 and in convening the second High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment.

Resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO, submitted by the following Workers' delegates: Ms. Aerenlund (Denmark); Mr. Blondel (France); Mr. Brett (United Kingdom); Ms. Buverud Pedersen (Norway); Mr. Doucouré (Mali); Mr. Douglas (New Zealand); Mr. Edström (Sweden); Mrs. Engelen-Kefer (Germany); Mr. Falbr (Czech Republic); Mr. Gray (United States); Mr. Itoh (Japan); Mr. Lettieri (Italy); Mr. Maitland (Australia); Mr. Mendoza (Philippines); Mr. Mukasa (Uganda); Mr. Parrot (Canada); Mr. Sánchez Madariaga (Mexico); Mr. Sibanda (Zimbabwe); Mr. Tapiola (Finland); Ms. Van de Burg (Netherlands); and Mr. Verzetnitsch (Austria)[*]

[*] The following Workers' delegates: Mr. Agyei (Ghana), Mr. Ahmed (Pakistan), and Mr. Trotman (Barbados), were also amongst the authors of the resolution. Their credentials had not reached the Office at the date of publication of the resolution.

The General Conference of the International Labour Orgnization,

Considering that 1994 marks the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Orgnization, and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia,

Saluting the pioneer role of the ILO in advancing social justice and world peace through the defence and promotion of the rights and interests of workers and the improvement of working conditions,

Affirming that this basic mandate, set out in the ILO's Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia, must continue to guide the Organization and to be pursued with vigour,

Underlining that the setting and supervision of international labour standards have been critical to the ILO's work and achievements and remain its principal means of action,

Considering also that the ILO derives its strength and unique importance from its tripartite structure,

Noting the report Defending values, promoting change, presented by the Director-General to the Conference,

Acknowledging that the rapid changes taking place in the world of work, and particularly the globalization of the world economy, require the ILO to adapt in order to be able to most effectively pursue its established mandate and objectives, including the promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment;

1. Declares that the ILO's Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), constitute a World Charter of Workers' Rights which should be fully observed in all countries.

2. Calls on governments and, where appropriate, on workers' and employers' organizations:

(a) to rededicate themselves to the values and objectives of the ILO, and to the principle and practice of tripartism;

(b) to recognize the growing responsibilities facing the ILO in carrying out its established mandate in rapidly changing and increasingly complex circumstances, and to make available to it the resources needed to meet those responsibilities;

(c) to meet fully their obligations under the ILO Constitution, particularly those arising from the ratification of Conventions, and to comply with the conclusions of its supervisory mechanisms;

(d) to mark the ILO's anniversary by taking action to ratify and strengthen the application of the Conventions contained in the World Charter of Workers' Rights;

(e) to recognize and reinforce the standing of the ILO within the international community as the global organization with exclusive competence in social and labour matters.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office:

(a) to take into full account the views expressed in the debate on the Director-General's Report to the Conference when considering proposals concerning the future activities of the Organization;

(b) to instruct the Director General to ensure, when presenting such proposals, that they:

  (i) reflect the ILO's core mandate and advance its basic objectives of social justice and world peace;

  (ii) equip the ILO to address effectively the challenges of globalization, particularly in respect of the relationship between international trade and workers' rights and to the activities of multinational enterprises;

  (iii) contain concrete initiatives to strengthen the role of the ILO in the formulation and implementation of structural adjustment programmes, including through the establishment of effective and cooperative arrangements with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank to strengthen the social dimension of adjustment;

  (iv) give priority to the creation of good quality jobs on the scale required by the global unemployment crisis;

  (v) promote the strength and capacities of workers' and employers' organizations;

  (vi) reassert the role of international labour standards as the ILO's primary means of action;

  (vii) promote the World Charter of Workers' Rights.

Resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the elimination of child labour, submitted by the following Workers' delegates: Ms. Aerenlund (Denmark); Mr. Blondel (France); Mr. Brett (United Kingdom); Ms. Buverud Pedersen (Norway); Mr. Doucouré (Mali); Mr. Douglas (New Zealand); Mr. Edström (Sweden); Mrs. Engelen-Kefer (Germany); Mr. Falbr (Czech Republic); Mr. Gray (United States); Mr. Itoh (Japan); Mr. Krzaklewski (Poland); Mr. Lettieri (Italy); Mr. Maitland (Australia); Mr. Mendoza (Philippines); Mr. Mukasa (Uganda); Mr. Parrot (Canada); Mr. Sánchez Madariaga (Mexico); Mr. Sibanda (Zimbabwe); Mr. Sundaram (Sri Lanka); Mr. Tapiola (Finland); Ms. Van de Burg (Netherlands); and Mr. Verzetnitsch (Austria) *

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling the Resolution concerning the International Year of the Child and the Progressive Elimination of Child Labour and Transitional Measures, adopted at its 65th Session in 1979,

Recalling also the debate on the Director-General's Report on Child Labour which took place at its 69th Session in 1983,

Welcoming the increased attention paid by the ILO to the elimination of child labour through its 1992-93 interdepartmental project,

* The following Workers' delegates: Mr. Agyei (Ghana), Mr. Ahmed (Pakistan), Mr. Mayaki (Niger), and Mr. Trotman (Barbados), were also amongst the authors of the resolution. Their credentials had not reached the Office at the date of publication of the resolution.

Considering that proper and full follow-up should be given to the outcome of the project,

Expressing appreciation of the allocation of substantial extra-budgetary resources to the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC),

Considering that there is need for full coordination between the IPEC and the activities of relevant ILO technical units, and that the ILO policy statement "Towards the abolition of child labour" provides the appropriate basis for such coordination,

Reaffirming that the elimination of child labour remains a priority objective for the ILO, and that all activities aimed at the regulation and humanization of child labour must contribute to the attainment of that objective, in line with the provisions of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138),

Encouraged by the fact that an unprecedented number of States have become signatories and parties to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child:

1. Invites governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organizations:

(a) to renew their commitment to the elimination of child labour, where necessary, through the adoption and full implementation of national strategies involving the ratification and application of Convention No. 138;

(b) to give priority attention to bringing to an immediate end all forms of child bondage and slavery, child labour in onerous and hazardous conditions, and work by younger children;

(c) to take effective steps to prevent commercial gain from the exploitation of child labour and to apply sanctions against those responsible;

(d) to cooperate in the formulation and implementation of the educational and development policies essential for the long-term elimination of all forms of child labour.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to make provisions to ensure adequate follow-up to the Interdepartmental Project on the Elimination of Child Labour;

(b) to coordinate such follow-up activities with those of the IPEC, and to keep it informed regularly of developments and progress in this regard;

(c) to ensure that the elimination of child labour is given due priority in the work of the multidisciplinary teams;

(d) to ensure full cooperation between the ILO and other United Nations bodies working in the field of child labour;

(e) to undertake comprehensive studies on child labour in various industries and to intensify ILO efforts to disseminate information on the international labour standards relating to minimum age for employment, with a view to promoting their ratification and application by governments;

(f) to present to it at an early opportunity detailed proposals for the convening of a World Conference on the Elimination of Child Labour.

Standing Orders questions

Note concerning Standing Orders questions placed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office before the Conference at its 81st Session

AMENDMENTS TO THE STANDING ORDERS OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

1. The Governing Body has proposed to the Conference an amendment to articles 38 and 39 of the Conference Standing Orders that would facilitate the preparatory stages of standard-setting work. At its 256th Session (May 1993), the Governing Body had decided to advance its decision on the agenda of the Conference from its November session to the preceding pre-Conference session and to combine the March and May sessions into a single session in March. This decision meant that there would be a period of 26 months before the first discussion of a technical item instead of the 18 months as at present. The Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards recommended to the Governing Body at its 258th Session (November 1993) an amendment to the Standing Orders of the Conference which would extend the time-limit for the first reports to reach governments from 12 to 18 months before the opening of the Conference session and would give governments three additional months in which to prepare their replies.

2. On the recommendation of the Committee, the Governing Body submits to the Conference, for adoption, the following proposed amendments to article 38, paragraphs 1 and 3 and article 39, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Conference Standing Orders:[1]

Preparatory stages of single-discussion procedure

1. When a question is governed by the single-discussion procedure, the International Labour Office shall communicate to the governments, so as to reach them not less than [12] 18 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which the question is to be discussed, a summary report upon the question containing a statement of the law and practice in the different countries and accompanied by a questionnaire drawn up with a view to the preparation of Conventions or Recommendations. This questionnaire shall request governments to consult the most representative organizations of employers and workers before finalizing their replies and to give reasons for their replies. Such replies should reach the Office as soon as possible and not less than [eight] 11 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which the question is to be discussed. In the case of federal countries and countries where it is necessary to translate questionnaires into the national language the period of [four] seven months allowed for the preparation of replies shall be extended to [five] eight months if the government concerned so requests.

3. These arrangements shall apply only in cases in which the question has been included in the agenda of the Conference not less than [18] 26 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which it is to be discussed. If the question has been included in the agenda less than [18] 26 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which it is to be discussed, a programme of reduced intervals shall be approved by the Governing Body; if the Officers of the Governing Body do not consider it practicable for the Governing Body to approve a detailed programme, it shall be in their discretion to agree on a programme of reduced intervals with the Director-General.

Preparatory stages of double-discussion procedure

1. When a question is governed by the double-discussion procedure, the International Labour Office shall prepare as soon as possible a preliminary report setting out the law and practice in the different countries and any other useful information, together with a questionnaire. The report and the questionnaire requesting the governments to consult the most representative organizations of employers and workers before finalizing their replies and to give reasons for their replies shall be communicated by the Office to the governments so as to reach them not less than [12] 18 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which the question is to be discussed.

2. The replies should reach the Office as soon as possible and not less than [eight] 11 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which the question is to be discussed. In the case of federal countries and countries where it is necessary to translate questionnaires into the national language, the period of [four] seven months allowed for the preparation of replies shall be extended to [five] eight months if the government concerned so requests.

Reports of the Selection Committee

First report

1. Election of the Officers of the Committee

The Selection Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman:	Mr. Ilabaca Orphanopoulos (Government member, Chile)
Employers' Vice-Chairman:	Mr. M'Kaissi (Employers' member, Tunisia)
Workers' Vice-Chairman:	Mr. Brett (Workers' member, United Kingdom)

2. Discussion of the Reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General: closing date for the list of speakers

The Selection Committee decided that the list of speakers would be closed on Wednesday, 15 June at 12 noon, under the usual conditions.

3. Plan of work of Conference committees

The Selection Committee endorsed a plan of work for committees, which is not binding but will enable them, in organising their work, to take maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. The plan is appended in tabular form for the information of the Conference (Appendix II).

4. Electronic voting at the Conference

A system of electronic voting was used for the first time at the 80th (1993) Session of the Conference during plenary sittings and for the vote held by the Resolutions Committee under article 17 of the Standing Orders.

Prior to last year's session of the Conference, at its 256th (May 1993) Session the Governing Body gave consideration to the implications of the introduction of electronic voting for the application of the Standing Orders. The only issues that arise concern terminology (for example, in the case of a "vote by show of hands"), and the Governing Body decided that it was premature to make terminological changes in the Standing Orders without taking account of the broader practical implications and potentialities of electronic voting in the light of sufficient experience. The present session of the Conference offers an opportunity to gain further experience with a view to the subsequent amendment of the Standing Orders on the basis of an assessment of the potential and practical implications of the system.

At its 259th (March 1994) Session, the Governing Body hence decided to propose to the Conference that at its present session it should again simply decide on an ad hoc basis to use the electronic voting system, and accordingly recommends that the Conference adopt the following decision at the beginning of its present session:

> Unless the Officers of the Conference otherwise decide for a given question or a given sitting, the different methods of voting set out in article 19 of the Standing Orders shall be implemented in the plenary by means of the electronic system of voting outlined in Appendix I to this report. This system of voting may also be used for the Resolutions Committee in the framework of article 17 of the Standing Orders if the necessary facilities are available.

The Selection Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the above decision.

A description of the electronic voting system is attached in Appendix I.

5. Suggestions to facilitate the work of the Conference

(a) Quorum

As in previous years, the Selection Committee invites the Conference to confirm the following principles:

(i) the quorum will be fixed provisionally, on the basis of the credentials received, in the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body on the day before the opening of the Conference, which is appended to the record of the first sitting of the Conference. This provisional quorum will remain unchanged until the Credentials Committee determines the quorum on the basis of registrations, it being understood that, if an important vote were to take place in the initial stages of the Conference (once the Credentials Committee has been appointed), the Conference might request the Credentials Committee to determine the quorum in an urgent report;

(ii) thereafter, the quorum will be adjusted, under the authority of the Credentials Committee, so as to take into account new registrations and notices of departure from delegates leaving the Conference;

(iii) delegates should register immediately on arrival, since the quorum is calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered;

(iv) acceptance of appointment as a delegate implies an obligation to be available in Geneva personally or through an adviser authorised to act as a substitute for the work of the Conference until its end, since important votes often take place on the last day;

(v) delegates who are nevertheless obliged to leave the Conference before it finishes should give notice of their forthcoming departure to the secretariat of the Conference. (The form provided for indicating their date of departure also enables them to authorise an adviser to act and to vote in their place.) At group meetings held during the second half of the Conference the attention of members of the groups will be drawn to the importance of completing and handing in this form;

(vi) in addition, one Government delegate of a country may report the departure of the other Government delegate, and the Secretaries of the Employers' and Workers' groups may also give notice of the final departure of members of their groups who have not authorised advisers to act in their place;

(vii) when a record vote is taken in plenary while committees are sitting, delegates are both entitled and expected to leave committees to vote unless they are replaced by a substitute in plenary. Announcements are made in the committees to ensure that all delegates are aware that a record vote is about to take place. Appropriate arrangements will be made for committees meeting in the ILO building.

(b) Punctuality

The Selection Committee recommends the Conference to ask committee chairmen to start proceedings very punctually — except where a technical section has not yet completed its preliminary discussions — irrespective of the number of persons present, but on condition that votes will not be taken unless a quorum is clearly present.

(c) Negotiations

In order to facilitate more continuous negotiation in committees between the different groups, representatives of each group should meet with the chairman and reporter of the committee and with the representative of the Secretary-General, whenever this is desirable, to ensure that the leaders of each group know fully the minds of their colleagues in the other groups; normally such meetings are held before each group has committed itself to a definite position. The function of these informal meetings is to afford opportunities for a fuller understanding of differences of view before definite positions have crystallised.

6. Participation in Conference committees by Members having lost the right to vote

At its 239th Session (February-March 1988), the Governing Body considered the implications of the appointment, as regular members of Conference committees, of representatives of a member State which had lost the right to vote under Article 13.4 of the Constitution of the ILO. It noted that, while the appointment of employers' and workers' representatives from such a State had no practical implications, because the employers' and workers' groups operated an effective system under Article 56, paragraph 5(b) of the Conference Standing Orders for ensuring that deputy members of a committee voted in the place of regular members deprived of the right to vote, the same was not true of the Government group. As a result, if a Government that has lost the right to vote is appointed as a regular member of a committee, the distribution of votes between the three groups is distorted because the weighting of votes is based on the full regular membership and in practice the Government regular members of committees who are unable to vote do not make use of the possibility afforded by Article 56, paragraph 5(a) of appointing a deputy member to vote in their place.

The Governing Body accordingly recommended that, in order to avoid such distortions, members of the Government group should not apply for regular membership of committees if they were not at the time in question entitled to vote. Should this practice, which has been maintained at all sessions of the Conference since 1987, for any reason not be fully respected, the weighting coefficients in committees should be calculated on the basis of the number of Government members entitled to vote.

The Selection Committee accordingly recommends to the Conference that the calculation of weighting coefficients for votes in committees should be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote.

The electronic voting system takes account of this practice.

7. Request by a non-member State to be represented by a delegation of observers at the 81st (1994) Session of the International Labour Conference

The Secretary-General has received a letter dated 20 May 1994 from the Ambassador, Permanent Representative of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to the United Nations Office in Geneva, requesting on behalf of the Government of that country an invitation to be represented by a delegation of observers at the present session of the Conference.

The Governing Body has authorized the Director-General to invite the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to be represented at several sessions of the Conference since the 70th (1984) Session, in accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(e) of the Conference Standing Orders.

The Selection Committee accordingly recommends that the Conference authorize the Secretary-General to invite the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to be represented at the 81st (1994) Session of the Conference, in accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(e) of the Conference Standing Orders.

8. Requests for representation in Conference committees submitted by non-governmental international organizations

In accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(j) of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that the following organizations be invited to be represented in the Committees stated:

9. Consideration of the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories

On the basis of proposals submitted to it by the Director-General at the invitation of the Governing Body, the Selection Committee has decided to convene a special sitting for the discussion of the Appendix to the Director-General's Report dealing with the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, it being understood that speakers would have to confine their remarks at that sitting to this Appendix and that, conversely, that subject would not be discussed in the framework of the discussion on the remainder of the Report. It decided that the special sitting should be held in the afternoon of Thursday, 16 June.

In addition, the Selection Committee recommends the Conference to allow speakers who so wish to take the floor both on the General Report and during the special sitting, it being understood that the subject to be discussed in that sitting would not be discussed in the debate on the remainder of the Report.

It should be recalled in this connection that, according to Article 14, paragraph 6 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the time-limit for speeches is a matter for the Conference to decide on the proposal of its Officers. In view of experience at the special sittings held during the 77th (1990), 78th (1991), 79th (1992) and 80th (1993) Sessions of the Conference, and in particular of the large number of speakers who will probably wish to take the floor, the Selection Committee invites the President, after consulting the Vice-Presidents, to submit to the Conference for decision without debate a proposal concerning the duration of speeches in the special sitting, taking due account of the number of speakers registered. For this purpose the Selection Committee has decided that the list of speakers for the special sitting will be closed at 6 pm on Tuesday, 14 June.

The Selection Committee also noted that the Director-General intended to devote a part of his comprehensive reply to the discussion of his Report to drawing lessons from the special sitting.

Lastly, the Selection Committee decided that the following committees should not meet at the same time as the special sitting: Finance Committee, Resolutions Committee, Committee on Apartheid.

10. Composition of the Credentials Committee

The Selection Committee proposes to the Conference that the three members of the Credentials Committee should be the following:

Government member:	Mr. Spencer (Trinidad and Tobago)
Employers' member:	Mr. Funes de Rioja (Argentina)
Workers' member:	Mr. Trotman (Barbados).

11. Appointment of the Conference Drafting Committee

The Selection Committee recommends that, in accordance with the provisions of Article 6, paragraph 1 of the Standing Orders, the Conference Drafting Committee should be composed as follows:

The President of the Conference

The Secretary-General of the Conference

The Legal Adviser of the Conference

The Director of the International Labour Standards Department

The Deputy Legal Adviser of the Conference.

12. Composition of committees

The full lists of the composition of committees are given in Appendix III.

Signed

J.L. Ilabaca Orphanopoulos,
Chairman

Geneva, 7 June 1994.

Appendix I

Description of the electronic voting system

The electronic system provides for votes (in most cases: yes, no, abstention) to be expressed by means of a keyboard on a "voting station" that will be made available to all delegates or persons empowered to vote on their behalf.

Where the electronic system is used, the subject and question to be voted on will be displayed, as well as the nature of the vote (show of hands, record vote or secret ballot) and the President or Chairman will announce the beginning of the vote. After the President or Chairman has made sure that all delegates have been given sufficient opportunity to record their vote in one of the voting stations available to them, the President or Chairman will announce the closure of the vote.

Where the method of vote is by show of hands, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required.

Where a record vote is taken, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. These indications will subsequently be published together with a list of the delegates who have voted, showing how they have voted.

In the case of a secret ballot, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. There will be absolutely no access possible to individual votes nor any record of how the delegates have voted.

It is important that, as at present, delegates should have previously decided whether they or another member of their delegation will exercise their right to vote in a given case. Where more than one vote is nevertheless cast on behalf of a delegate at two different moments or from two different places, only the first vote will be recognized, whether made by a delegate, by a substitute delegate or by an adviser who has received a specific written authorization to that end. Such specific authorizations must reach the secretariat sufficiently before the opening of voting is announced so as to be duly recorded.

International Labour Conference

Provisional Record

First sitting

Tuesday, 7 June 1994, 10.00 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Nkomo, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and Mr. Gray

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Mr. NKOMO (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – It is with great pleasure that I welcome you to this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

As we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia this year, it gives me great pleasure to welcome all the distinguished representatives of member States, representatives and observers of the United Nations and of its specialized agencies, representatives of observer States, as well as those of the governmental and non-governmental international organizations who are attending this session of the Conference.

May I welcome the representatives of the Swiss Confederation and of the Republic and Canton of Geneva, who have been host to the ILO since its inception 75 years ago. On this momentous occasion of the 75th anniversary of our Organization, it is only fitting that the representative of the Swiss Confederation, the Federal Councillor, Mr. Jean-Pascal Delamuraz, should address this session of the Conference this morning during a special commemorative ceremony due to begin at 11.30 in the Assembly Hall.

I also wish to extend a special welcome to the following States who have become Members of the ILO since the last session of the Conference: Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Oman and, in a very special way, South Africa. I deliberately singled out South Africa as it was a founder Member of the ILO when it was established in 1919 and was, at the same time, an active participant in the formulation of the Declaration of Philadelphia in 1944. It had for many years fully participated in ILO activities until its exit in 1964. We therefore take great pleasure in having among us today the delegation of the first non-racial and democratically elected government in the history of South Africa. It is profoundly gratifying to the ILO that the struggle waged for decades to end apartheid in which the ILO actively participated and relentlessly supported has come to fruition. In this regard, may I take this opportunity to express hearty congratulations to the new Government of South Africa and express warm words of welcome to its delegation upon their rejoining the ILO after a 30-year absence.

The advent of democracy in South Africa has ushered in a new era, not only for South Africa, but also for the southern African region as a whole. For decades, the southern African region has been harangued by acts of political, military and socio-economic destabilization borne out of apartheid, including the highly destructive wars in Angola and Mozambique. With democracy in place in that country, it is my fervent hope that the region will now be able to redirect its efforts from confrontation to cooperation with South Africa and work together in redoubling efforts to promote economic development in the region.

We look forward to working actively with all these new member States in our endeavour to establish global peace, and social justice and freedom as we pursue our relentless war against poverty.

My welcome would not be complete without extending it to the representatives of the media, through whose tireless efforts our deliberations during the Conference will be communicated to the entire world, particularly the world of labour.

In keeping with our tradition, the Conference will be honoured to have a special guest who, this year, will be Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, Secretary-General of the United Nations Organization. He will address the Conference during a special sitting on Thursday, 9 June, at 10 o'clock and we look forward to deriving tremendous benefit from his experiences as a distinguished and accomplished international civil servant.

This year the Conference is taking place within the context of two major anniversaries I referred to earlier. The original mandate of the ILO as defined in the Treaty of Peace signed at Versailles in 1919 was confined to the improvement of labour conditions enshrined in the nine principles of the Labour Charter which included payment of adequate wages to maintain a reasonable standard of living, abolition of child labour, equitable economic treatment of all workers in their countries, and the enactment of laws pertaining to worker protection.

The Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944 widened this mandate by giving the ILO competence in areas beyond conditions of work, such as unemployment and poverty alleviation. This was aimed at influencing the impact of economic policies on labour conditions in an effort to move away from the purely social to a widely embracing socio-economic sphere. Looking at it in retrospect, 75 years after its birth and 50 years since the Declaration of Philadelphia, one observes that a lot of progress has been made and that significant achievements have been obtained.

Nevertheless, the battle for economic security based on social justice is far from being won. The ILO, therefore, still needs to continue its endeavours to facilitate and further promote the attainment of economic security and social justice. Furthermore, the objectives of the Declaration of Philadelphia, particularly full and improved employment and improved standards of living, must be vigorously pursued. This, therefore, is a time not only to celebrate the ILO's past achievements, but also to take stock and make an impartial and thorough assessment of the Organization's work as well as to see how we can enhance its contribution to the improvement of humanity in a continuously changing global socio-economic setting. Indeed, the bedrock objectives of the ILO can only be achieved in the context of actual developments in the real world. The attainment of social justice, permanent peace and prosperity hinges not only on issues pertaining to the ILO's mandate, but also on other variables. Hence, a tunnel vision of the objectives of the ILO, its past and present achievements and its future agenda can be fully appreciated in this broad context for it is self-evident that in an environment littered with social inequities, military conflicts and abject poverty, our noble objectives can remain but a mere pipe dream. Undoubtedly, a multi-pronged thinking process is required if we are to fulfil the basic tenets of the ILO's remit. The complexities of today's world necessitate adaptation to and acknowledgement of the interlinkages between social justice, peace and stability and seemingly unrelated issues such as refugees and disarmament which impinge on the realization of ILO objectives.

The desire for lasting peace seems to be eluding us all even in the wake of the demise of the East-West divide. For how else can we explain or understand the growing insensitivity to the mushrooming conflicts in various corners of the world. The Rwandan genocide, to mention only one, is quite illustrative of this. Without international peace and security, all our efforts at alleviating the scourge of poverty will come to nothing.

In the same vein, social and economic deprivation also threatens global peace and security. The most recent ILO labour force estimates and projections show that an average of 43 million jobseekers join the global market every year. Most of these are in developing countries, and with the level of unemployment on the increase throughout the world, there is a strong trend of burgeoning social frustration which further poses a serious threat to global social stability and political tranquillity. It is in this light, and it is in the light of such dangers, that I commend the recently convened Jobs Summit held in the United States to seek ways to alleviate the unemployment problem. Our efforts, however, in addressing this problem, should be broadened and intensified if we are to achieve meaningful global socio-economic justice.

Furthermore, the involvement of the ILO in the substantive preparations for the World Summit for Social Development and the Fourth World Conference on Women, both of which are to be held in 1995, is clear testimony of the ILO's important role when addressing global issues and economic questions with a bearing on its mandate. In addressing these topics, we should be cognisant of other related questions, including the issue of environment.

In this regard, we welcome the successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round, which has raised expectations for sustained global economic growth and development. However, we note that preliminary assessments of the results of the Uruguay Round indicate that developing countries will be the net losers at the implementation stage. Moreover, issues of great concern to all, such as the Social Clause, need to be closely examined in the light of their positive and negative impact on our economies and on society at large. Nevertheless, it remains our hope that the new international trading regime will contribute to a more stable and fair global economic order.

In an attempt to pursue sustainable economic development, many developing countries have zealously embarked on economic structural adjustment programmes. The results attained to date leave much to be desired, as evidenced by the social dislocations and political unrest accompanying their implementation. Whilst no one questions the need for these programmes, it is, however, time that we addressed some of the exogenous factors that encumber their successful implementation, such as the debt burden and the dwindling flow of financial resources.

Although we are one big family within the ILO, our experiences and realities are wide and varied. This, in itself, should be a source of strength, for with well-managed cross-fertilization we can improve on our own domestic conditions. In this regard, in my country we have an expression which says "learning never ends", and so we are all permanently students of life. During my term of office I had occasion to visit the ILO regional offices in North America and South-East Asia, and it was a pleasure for me to note the ingenuity applied to specific situations. The ILO's multidisciplinary teams could play a key role in fostering closer intra- and inter-regional exchanges which could ultimately enhance the technical assistance by providing the ILO constituencies with the necessary expertise. For this to be achieved, the Office needs to facilitate more exchanges of technical experiences of the MDTs within and between the various regions.

In the light of the foregoing, the Director-General's Report, entitled Defending values, promoting change. Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda will be quite an appropriate basis for discussion in this plenary, as it raises a number of thought-provoking questions which need to be adequately addressed by this forum, in line with the avowed commitment of this Organization. Worthy to note are the various ways in which our Organization, while remaining true to its mandate of promoting social justice, can facilitate the enunciation of concrete social policies and mechanisms aimed at realizing our goals in the broader context of this fast-changing world.

For our consideration in the plenary this year, there are traditional items on the Conference agenda: the report of the Chairman of the Governing Body (this year there will be an oral report and not a written one), the programme and budget and other financial questions, information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations and questions relating to Standing Orders.

The Conference will also have before it the Special Report of the Director-General on the Review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. In view of the historic developments which have recently taken place in South Africa, it is almost a foregone conclusion that this will probably be the last time that the Committee on Apartheid will be meeting within the framework of the International Labour Conference. Henceforth, our efforts will be directed to the provision of assistance that South Africa certainly needs in order to put the legacy of apartheid behind us and to ensure the establishment of a lasting democracy and the effective establishment of social justice in that country.

Furthermore, in accordance with the decisions reached at the 259th Session of the Governing Body in March 1994, proposals will be made to the Selection Committee for the holding of a special sitting of the Conference to consider the appendix to Part II of the Director-General's Report, concerning the situation of workers in the occupied territories.

This year there will be three important subjects on the agenda of the Conference's technical committees; two for standard-setting purposes and one for general discussion.

The item on part-time work is up for a second discussion, with a view to adopting a Convention and a Recommendation at the end of our session. This type of work affects an increasing number of persons worldwide in both industrialized and developing countries, and we expect the Conference to adopt instruments which, while maintaining flexibility, will adequately address the issue and reconcile the interests of all concerned.

The second standard-setting item is safety and health in mines. The first discussion of this item will take place this year. The importance of this item cannot be overstated, given the vast number of persons employed in this sector worldwide and the significant role the mining sector plays in many economies. We therefore look forward to a very positive outcome of the discussions that will be held on this item.

The third technical item placed on the agenda of the Conference by the Governing Body is the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. For more than 20 years there has been a desire for the Conference to consider this item, which has been the subject of great controversy between the advocates and opponents of state monopoly of placement offices. It is hoped that a general discussion on this issue will contribute to ending this long-standing controversy and to laying the groundwork for possibly updating existing international standards in this field.

As in previous years, we have received a number of resolutions which deal with some of the most topical issues in the world of work today and which propose the course of action that can be taken by the ILO and its Members to address these issues. I wish to stress the importance of the work of the Resolutions Committee which, to the extent that the subjects covered fall within the ILO's mandate, can often be used as a basis for future ILO action.

As decided by the Governing Body at its 259th Session (March 1994), an Informal Tripartite Meeting at the ministerial level on Employment will be held during this session of the Conference, on Friday, 10 June. This meeting will bring together the most senior social and economic policy makers of the ILO's Member States, as well as high-level representatives of workers and employers to discuss the issue of employment, the importance of which cannot be overemphasized as it is of particular concern to all countries throughout the world. The report, prepared by the Office to serve as a basis for discussion at the meeting, is entitled Towards full employment. It broadly outlines the various strategies which can be adopted to reach the target of full employment. The paper will be revised in the light of the discussions held during that meeting, after which it will be submitted to the second session of the Preparatory Committee for the World Summit for Social Development as part of the ILO's contribution to the Summit. The meeting will also provide a forum for the extensive exchange of ideas on how to tackle a common problem; I hope that this debate will be a stimulating one and will have a decisive impact on the future social and economic policies benefiting those of us who are responsible for formulating such policies in our respective countries.

I would like to draw your attention to the fact that this is the first session of the Conference at which we are implementing the new timetable adopted by the Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference at the 254th Session of the Governing Body. This will be a shortened Conference in comparison to previous sessions and we will therefore be obliged to organize our work as efficiently as possible.

To conclude my remarks, I would like once again to welcome you all and thank you all for having found the time to be present at this historic Conference, and on behalf of the Officers of the Governing Body, Mr. Oechslin, the Employer Vice-Chairman and Mr. Brett, the Worker Vice-Chairman, I wish all participants every success in your deliberations on the wide range of subjects of this Conference which, hopefully, will lead to the formulation of concrete ideas to uplift the social well-being of the whole of mankind.

It is now my honour and privilege to formally declare the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference open. Long live the ILO, and long live its constituents.

ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT

Mr. NKOMO (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – We now proceed to the next item on our agenda, the election of the President of the International Labour Conference. I give the floor to the Chairman of the Government group, Mr. Salah, Minister of Labour, Jordan.

Original Arabic: Mr. SALAH (Minister of Labour, Jordan) – I think you know that it is customary for the President of the International Labour Conference to come from the Government group. However, sometimes the Government group waives its right and cedes its place to one of the other groups, especially on the occasion of special ceremonies or anniversaries of the Organization. I should therefore like to state formally, on this important 75th anniversary of the Organization, that the Government group would like to ask the Workers' group to nominate a candidate for the presidency of the International Labour Conference this year.

Mr. BRETT (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom) – I am honoured to take the floor on this historic occasion. It is historic firstly because we all know the ILO is marking the 75th anniversary of its history, and its activities to improve the lives of workers everywhere. But it is also, as mentioned, this year historic for another reason.

The last 30 years of that history South Africa has not been a Member of the ILO. The time of apartheid placed it beyond the scope and principles of our Organization. Today the apartheid system and South Africa's long absence has an end, and on behalf of the Workers' group, I welcome back to the ILO that country's democratic elected government, its non-racial employers organizations, and above all, if I may be allowed, its independent trade union organizations, which played such a vital role in bringing freedom to South Africa. The ending of apartheid is a victory for all the people of South Africa: but it is no exaggeration to say that it would not have come about without the courageous struggle of their trade unions and I salute them.

The Workers' group would also like to thank its colleagues from the Government and Employers' groups for allowing them the honour of making a nomination for the President of this Conference. With that privilege goes responsibility – the responsibility of ensuring that this historic event is directed by a delegate of highest competence and greatest skill. For these reasons it is my pleasure to present the nomination of Mr. Charles Gray, Workers' delegate of the United States for the presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. Mr. Gray has 40 years of international and national experience as a trade unionist. He became a member, then a local officer of what is now the United Food and Commercial Workers' Union in his native Ohio, before moving to his headquarters as an international organizer. From there he moved to Europe in 1958 and joined the staff of the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical and Technical Employees (FIET), where he served as Assistant General Secretary. In 1971 he moved to the Asian-American Free Institute, becoming its Executive Director in 1985. In 1992, Mr. Gray took his present post as Director of the International Affairs Department of the United States Trade Union Centre, the AFL-CIO, in which capacity he has played a prominent role in the work of the International Trade Union Movement. He serves on numerous bodies, particularly those dedicated to promotion of trade union and human rights throughout the world. He represents the AFLCIO on the United States Council for Foreign Affairs and for the United States Pacific Economic Cooperation Council. It is, however, for his work in the ILO that he is best known to many in this hall. He has been participating in the International Labour Conference since 1962, and in 1991 was elected a member of the Governing Body where he currently serves as the Workers' spokesman in the Committee dealing with sectoral and technical meetings.

Delegates will see that he brings to this Conference a wealth of experience, a profound knowledge of the ILO, as well as a deep commitment to his objectives. I therefore take great pleasure on behalf of the Workers' group to present the candidacy of my good friend and colleague, Charles Gray, to assume the presidency of this session of the Conference.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to associate myself with what you and Mr. Brett have said, in welcoming the presence amongst us of a tripartite delegation from South Africa. For many of us, and for me personally, this is an historic occasion and I would like to express the great pleasure of my group in being able to welcome this delegation. I am referring of course to the tripartite delegation, but I would especially like to welcome the employers' part of the delegation and the new non-racial employers' organization which was set up just before this session of the Conference.

On behalf of the Employers' group, and I am speaking on their unanimous behalf, I am very happy to support the candidacy of Mr. Charles Gray, Director of the International Affairs Department of the AFLCIO to be President of this Conference. I had the privilege of being at this Conference in 1969, on the 50th anniversary of this Organization, when Jean Möri, also a member of the Workers' group, presided over the Conference; Jean Möri, whom I knew well and who was a great friend.

We are very happy to support this candidacy for many reasons. The first one of course is that it enshrines the principle of equality amongst the groups and the possibility of a representative of a non-governmental group to accede to one of the highest offices of this Organization. We consider that support for Mr. Gray is a sign of our esteem and respect for the Workers' group. Of course we have had and we will probably continue to have, during the course of this Conference, disagreements with the Workers' group – that is in the very nature of things – but this does not prevent us from feeling respect and esteem for each other, which is why I think it is important for this to be said at the very outset of the Conference.

We are also very happy to support this candidacy because it concerns a citizen of the United States – a great country where the ILO has held meetings on many occasions, including in Philadelphia, and we are of course also celebrating the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The United States has always played an important role in the ILO's history, even when it was absent from the ILO. I would mention the role that it played right from the time of the preparatory meetings, which led to the creation of the ILO; and the name of Samuel Gompers should also be mentioned in this connection.

I would like to add, on my own behalf, that for a Frenchman this is also an important day for us to pay tribute to the United States. Lastly, I would say, and perhaps this is the most important point, that we are very happy to support this candidacy because it is for Charles Gray himself. Charles Gray, and this is probably the most important point, is a friend of all of us, he is a man whose integrity and authority we are well aware of, and we are certain that he will be a great President of the International Labour Conference.

Original Arabic: Mr. SALAH (Minister of Labour, Jordan) – On behalf of the Government group, I should like to endorse the candidacy of Mr. Charles Gray for the office of President of the Conference. We wish him every success in guiding its proceedings in such a way as to attain the objectives of the International Labour Organization.

Mr. NKOMO (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – The candidacy of Mr. Charles Gray, Workers' delegate, United States, has been duly proposed and seconded for the presidency of the 81st Session of the Conference. In the absence of any other nominations, I declare Mr. Charles Gray the unanimously elected President of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. It is now my pleasure to invite him to take the chair.

(Mr. GRAY, Workers' delegate, United States, is elected President of the Conference and takes the President's chair.)

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS

The PRESIDENT – To all of the delegations here today, I would like to express my sincere gratitude for my election as President of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. This is both a personal honour and a tribute to the people of the United States, whose workers I represent at the ILO, and indeed to the workers around the world. I wish particularly to thank Mr. William Brett of the United Kingdom and Chairperson of the Workers' group who nominated me for this important post, and Mr. Salah, Minister of Labour of Jordan, and Chairperson of the Government group of the Conference, who on behalf of his group, allowed the Workers, on an exceptional basis marking this Organization's 75th anniversary, to nominate me. I also extend my heartfelt thanks both to Mr. Salah and to Mr. Jean-Jacques Oechslin, Chairperson of the Employers' group, for supporting my nomination.

I would also like to take this opportunity to greet and congratulate the distinguished representatives of the newest member States – Oman, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan and South Africa. The continued growth of this Organization's membership is a sign of the respect which the ILO commands on the international scene and underlines the universality of the principles on which it was founded.

I believe this distinguished assembly will join me in extending a special welcome to the delegation from South Africa, following their recent readmission as a Member of the ILO. It has been a long and often painful process which has borne fruit in their recent democratic elections. For the past 20 years, the ILO has actively encouraged the process of democratization through the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. However, I also feel that the rest of the world could learn much from their recent experiences in managing cultural, ethnic and racial diversity to build a nation based on universal values. One of the lessons learned from their experience, which is particularly relevant to this assembly, is the role which tripartism and the active participation of civil society can play while the political process goes on in building the social and economic foundations of a new South Africa. Continuing dialogue between the workers' and employers' organizations and the new democratically elected Government in South Africa will, we trust, strengthen the process of peaceful transformation of South African society for the benefit of all.

I know that the honour of this Presidency comes with serious responsibilities and I pledge to you that I will spare no effort in attempting to meet them. I also thank you in advance for your support in making this a most successful proceeding.

It is, perhaps, historically fitting that a representative of the American labour movement hold this office on the 75th anniversary of the ILO's birth. Many of you know that Samuel Gompers, the first president of the American Federation of Labor, was a prime force behind the founding of this organization. In 1919, he was one of the President Wilson's two appointees to represent the United States on the Commission on International Labour Legislation of the Versailles Peace Conference. This Commission, which elected Gompers as its President, drew up a "workers' bill of rights", adopted as a part of the Peace Treaty itself. It declared in essence that:

- in right and in fact, the labour of a human being should not be treated as merchandise or as an article of commerce;
- employers and workers should be allowed the right of association for all lawful purposes;
- no child should be permitted to be employed in industry or commerce before the age of 14 years;
- between the years of 14 and 18, gainful employment should be permitted only at work not physically harmful and on the condition that technical or general education be continued;
- every worker has a right to a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life;
- equal pay should be given to women and to men for work of equal value in quantity and quality;
- there should be a weekly rest of 24 hours on Sunday or its equivalent for all workers;
- there should be a limitation of the hours of work in industry on the basis of an eight-hour day or 48-hour week.

Later that year the International Labour Conference met for the first time in Washington, DC. Twenty-five years later, meeting in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, the international community recommitted itself to these principles by adopting a declaration concerning the aims and purposes of the ILO.

This year, the Director-General has issued an outstanding report for this Conference entitled Defending values, promoting change. Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda. It is a reaffirmation of the essential objectives proclaimed 75 years ago and an illustration of how far we have come – and how far we still must go – towards meeting these goals.

In recent years, we have rejoiced in the extension of democratic rights to more and more of the world's workers, and the spread of citizen self-government to new corners of the globe. We have witnessed a vast expansion of the global economy, and enormous advances in the fields of medical science, production technologies and environmental awareness. And yet the general trend does not satisfy our organization – not when we see a corresponding rise in global levels of poverty and unemployment, an increasing gap between rich and poor, and millions upon millions of workers, in both the formal and the informal sectors, who are still denied the right to stand on their own feet and demand a fair share of the fruits of their labours.

It is a positive sign that, during the deliberations of the Governing Body last year, all three constituent groups of the ILO – workers, governments and employers – demonstrated serious concerns over the challenges now faced by the international community and by the role the ILO should play in finding solutions.

There should be no doubt that the ILO's mandate – the pursuit of social justice – is as critical to the peace and prosperity of the world today as it was 75 years ago. For us to be effective, full and true tripartism is essential, as is the recognition of the interplay between the social, political and economic spheres. It is my conviction, as it was for the signers of the Versailles Peace Treaty and the Declaration of Philadelphia, that worker rights are vital in all three.

In recent years the defence of fundamental worker and human rights has at times been called "cultural imperialism» and other things not quite so polite. While it is true that we often hear this view from the élites of nations where worker exploitation is most flagrant (and from their allies in corporations with the worst records of abuse) one nevertheless must resist the temptation to dismiss these arguments out of hand.

It is obviously prudent to consider how workers' conditions around the world are similar and how they are not. For example, there is general agreement, as reflected in ILO Conventions, that minimum wages should be determined on the basis of local conditions and costs of living. For example, a minimum wage in Indonesia will not be the same as in Sweden or Kuwait. However, while accepting this diversity, there must be respect for the universal principle of a minimum wage as a worker's right.

Perhaps even more importantly, we must ask ourselves how we are to ensure that minimum wages are respected in practice. In other words, are we prepared to go the extra step and develop the appropriate tools to ensure their application in the context not only of globalization but also of growing economic and social diversity and, in many cases, social conflict and abject poverty? Such tools must be innovative and imaginative. They must build on the ILO's standard-setting mechanism, but they must also be supported by operational programmes which address employment creation and poverty alleviation, thereby getting directly to the root of the problem of non-respect of standards.

Drawing the full perimeter of universality is certainly difficult. Nevertheless, there are most certainly areas of workers' rights that are fundamental and where the ILO must continue to push for universal application: these are basically the same rights mentioned in Sam Gompers' bill of rights, namely the right to freedom of association, to organize and bargain collectively, to equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and to be free of forced labour and child labour. One of the great contributions of the ILO over the past 75 years has been not only in delineating and publicizing these rights, but also in helping its social partners put them into practice.

The ILO's role and achievements – establishing a code of international labour standards, giving technical assistance to encourage growth of employment, helping to extend the boundaries of democracy by promoting workers' and popular participation, sponsoring invaluable research, devising new tools in the fight against poverty and much more – are absolutely unique. It is difficult to imagine another organization that could fill all of the needs that the ILO does.

The ILO can use its authority and expertise to help working people, as well as those who are denied the opportunity to work, and we must support an organization that continues to play this role with inspired dedication and professional competence. But the ILO cannot enforce the observance of workers' rights. In the end, that responsibility still belongs to the nation-state, although this responsibility should be carefully safeguarded by all of society's socio-economic forces.

While the nation-state remains that primary source of authority necessary to enforce workers' rights, there are some areas where nation-states have voluntarily and involuntarily ceded some of their authority. In the latter category, for instance, are prohibitions against the gross violation of human rights, such as the periodic genocides that have marked and continue to mark this century. The world community has the right – and I would say the obligation – to act against such horrors, even if this action involves the infringement of national sovereignty. And yet, the ongoing atrocities in Rwanda, where little has been done to stop the massacre of an estimated half-a-million people in a little more than a month, highlight the difficulties which the international community has in enforcing even the most basic human rights.

During our debates we shall be examining the former case where nation-states voluntarily trade morsels of their sovereignty for more enticing rewards. Here in particular, we note the rise of international economic regimes, such as the Bretton Woods framework, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and now the even more powerful World Trade Organization.

Since the global economy is based as much on work and workers as it is upon capital and investment flows, it is both natural and positive that there is a growing acceptance that worker rights should be linked to trade and credit relationships by a social clause.

To be effective, the ILO should also be a partner, respected for its own unique tripartite perspective, alongside the United Nations family organizations, including international financial and trade organizations, such as the World Trade Organization, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and regional financial institutions, to design, adopt and implement socio-economic policies that help reduce poverty, foster sustainable and employment-intensive economic growth, and improve the working and living conditions on this planet.

In my view, this tripartite body, as a necessary step in this direction, should recommit itself to the principles of 1919. We have to acknowledge that the neoliberal ideology – giving all rights to free market forces and none to human beings – will not automatically produce acceptable outcomes or social justice. This is not a time in the world's history to call into question the basic principles of the ILO's mission and standards: we have to be aware that we have been down this path before. The "law of the jungle" ideology, that some now seek to advance, helped plunge the world into the deepest depression and the most dangerous war that mankind has yet experienced.

I hope that we will take this opportunity also to consider the ILO's role at next year's World Summit for Social Development. The acute and dangerous problems of poverty, unemployment and social exclusion are high on the agenda and these areas fall squarely within the ILO's mandate. We should be prepared to contribute to this major international event not with lofty pronouncements but with the practical and sustainable solutions and be prepared to play a lead role in the follow-up to the Conference's recommendations.

For the ILO to be up to these vital and difficult tasks, this tripartite structure must hold together, just as we must all stand together across national, regional, class and cultural lines. Certainly, those of us in the room who labour on behalf of trade unions can testify how far human solidarity and a lot of hard work can take you. In the days ahead, this Organization will need both.

ELECTION OF THE VICE-PRESIDENTS

The PRESIDENT – In accordance with the amendments adopted by the Conference at its last session, we will proceed immediately with the election of the Vice-Presidents of the Conference. I call upon the Clerk of the Conference to read the nominations made by the groups.

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The candidates for the posts of Vice-Presidents of the Conference are as follows:

Government group:

Mr. MATINCHEV (Bulgaria)

Employers' group:

Mr. OULD SIDI (Mauritania)

Workers' group

Mr. MENDOZA (Philippines)

The PRESIDENT – If there are no objections I shall consider that these proposals have been adopted.

(The proposals are adopted.)

NOMINATION OF THE OFFICERS OF THE GROUPS

The PRESIDENT – We have the nominations of the Officers of the groups. Again I call upon the Clerk of the Conference to read the names of the persons who have been elected as Officers of the various groups.

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The following Officers have been selected by the groups:

Government group:

Chairman: Mr. Salah (Jordan)

Employers' group:

Chairman: Mr. Oechslin (France)

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. M'Kaissi (Tunisia)
Mr. Tsujino (Japan)
Mr. De Arbeloa (Venezuela)
Mr. Moorhead (United States)

Secretary: Mr. Kapartis (International Organization of Employers)

Workers' group:
Chairman: Mr. Brett (United Kingdom)

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Mugalla (Kenya)
Mr. Sánchez Madariaga (Mexico)

Mr. Mendoza (Philippines)
Mr. Mugalla (Kenya)
Mr. Mukasa (Uganda)
Mr. Parrot (Canada)
Mr. Sánchez Madariaga (Mexico)
Mr. Shmakov (Russian Federation)
Mr. Tan (Philippines)
Mr. Trotman (Barbados)
Mr. Vanni (Italy)

Secretary: Mr. Ryder (International Confederation of Free Trade Unions)

The PRESIDENT – The Conference takes note of the nominations made by the various groups.

CONSTITUTION AND COMPOSITION OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEES

The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the establishment of the various committees which will consider the matters before the Conference.

The Conference may wish to set up, in accordance with the amendments adopted by the Conference at its last session, the following committees: the Selection Committee, the Finance Committee, the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Committee on Part-Time Work, the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines, the Committee on Private Employment Agencies, the Resolutions Committee, the Standing Orders Committee and the Committee on Apartheid. In this regard I wish to point out to you that in accordance with the established practice the groups have agreed that the Committee on Apartheid should, as at previous sessions, be composed of a maximum of 20 members from each group and meet for a maximum of six sittings. May I take it that these proposals are adopted?

APPOINTMENT OF THE MEMBERS OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE

The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the appointment of the members of the Selection Committee. I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference.

COMMEMORATIVE CEREMONY TO MARK THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION AND THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DECLARATION OF PHILADELPHIA

The PRESIDENT – It is a great honour and a pleasure for me to preside over the ILO's 75th anniversary commemorative ceremony. As the oldest international organization within the United Nations family, the ILO has a special role to play in the pursuit of social justice and international peace. The Constitution of the International Labour Organization states that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice.

We are at the same time celebrating the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia which eloquently highlighted the close relationship between poverty alleviation and peace. As we recollect this fundamental document which helps define the ILO's mandate, let me take this opportunity to recognize Mr. Fernando Yllanes Ramos, a member of the Employers' delegation from Mexico, who was present at that historic 1944 Session of the Conference in Philadelphia. Mr. Ramos has faithfully promoted the Organization's tripartite values throughout his long and distinguished career. I would feel remiss at this point however if I did not mention his compatriot and my friend and colleague, the "Dean" of the Governing Body, Brother Sánchez Madariaga, who has served with high distinction for 49 years.

These two ILO anniversaries which we are celebrating in fact both correspond to the end of this century's most devastating wars. The birth of this Organization not only coincided with but indeed was an intregral part of the Versailles Peace Treaty ending the First World War and, just yesterday, Heads of State gathered to commemorate the allied landing in Normandy which set in motion the end of the Second World War.

The end of the Cold War has ended a period of fear and distrust between the superpowers. However, in its wake, we are now confronted by a new era of localized conflicts and social and ethnic unrest. Although the Cold War has ended, the end of the war on poverty, unemployment and social exclusion is nowhere in sight.

In the face of these seemingly intractable problems, the mandate of the International Labour Organization is more timely than ever. Let this ceremony then be not only a time for celebration – and we do have cause to celebrate – but also a time for serene reflection on the challenges that lie ahead, challenges which make this Organization as relevant and as necessary as ever.

I am pleased on this austere occasion and milestone in the ILO's history, to present not only our distinguished guest but also our distinguished host, Mr. Jean-Pascal Delamuraz, Federal Councillor of the Swiss Confederation and Minister of the Economy. Mr. Delamuraz has been in charge of the Swiss Federal Department of Economic Affairs, covering trade, agriculture and labour matters, since 1987. He is certainly an appropriate speaker for the ILO's 75th anniversary ceremony. First of all, Switzerland is respected the world over for its unique system of participatory democracy. Secondly, Switzerland has played a strong role in promoting and keeping peace far beyond its borders, as well as in maintaining a good record of social peace at home. Switzerland's reputation in these areas stems not only from the Government's policies and programmes in the developing world, but also from Switzerland's thriving and dedicated non-governmental organizations working often in difficult conditions, including areas struck by war and social conflict. I have great pleasure in introducing His Excellency, Mr. Delamuraz, as the ILO's guest speaker to commemorate our 75th anniversary.

However, before Mr. Delamuraz speaks, let us open our celebrations with a short concert from a string quartet composed of Mr. Roger Elmiger, violin, Mrs. Marie Sirot, violin, Mr. Max Lesueur, viola, and Mr. Stéphane Rieckhoff, cello. They will play for us a divertimento by Mozart in D major in three movements. Let the celebrations begin.

On behalf of the Conference I would like to thank the quartet for their musical interlude. I am sure your applause was an indication to them as to how much we appreciated their being with us today. It is a distinct pleasure and an honour for me to invite Mr. Jean-Pascal Delamuraz to take the rostrum.

Original French: Mr. DELAMURAZ (Federal Councillor of the Swiss Confederation) – The Government and the people of Switzerland are happy to welcome to Geneva, in the presence of the cantonal and municipal authorities who know how to bring the spirit of Geneva alive, the participants of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

This is a very special session since it allows us to celebrate together the 75th anniversary of the foundation of the International Labour Organization which is a living and active defender of labour and workers.

At the same time as commemorating this impressive anniversary and the many years of service to mankind, we are also celebrating the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia which made the objectives of the International Labour Organization even more ambitious than before and brought the Organization into the fold of the United Nations system.

I would in particular like to welcome Mr. Gray, President of the Conference, and congratulate him on his election. I would like to thank him for having given me such a solid place of honour. This is the second time I have had the privilege to sit here. Believe me, given the fragility of our political careers we are used to ejector seats. So, a solid chair is quite symbolic.

I would like once again to wish the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, every success in his important work, a task which he carries out with commitment and skill. I would also like to express words of gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard, former Director-General. We are all aware of his unforgettable services to this Organization and how he expanded its influence.

Born in 1919 at the same time as the League of Nations, the International Labour Office has shown us that despite all the real and imaginary upheavals which have taken place in three-quarters of a century, from the very outset, the ILO had taken the right path, undertaken the correct reforms and set out the pertinent tasks, because the major thrust of the Organization, as it remains with us today, was already in place then, conceived by inspired pioneers.

I think that this expression of gratitude to and recognition for those who set up this Organization, those who breathed life into it from the very outset and who then helped it to grow and prosper, is the main focus of our debates today. We acknowledge how much spirit, will and inspiration were required to ensure the success of this pioneering enterprise which we are all trying to make more vital than ever before.

The International Labour Organization generated hope and the basis for a revival after a long period of pain, destruction, poverty, disease, unemployment and social tensions. Since the very outset, the Organization has devoted itself to what I would call the focus of its work, which is to promote social justice, improve the conditions of work and strengthen the economic and social security of workers, namely to contribute to the attainment of the essential goal, ensuring the dignity of mankind and therefore to participate effectively and profoundly in the establishment of peace throughout the world. This mission, which has over the years extended to encompass the entire international community, is based on political peace, freedom and economic progress. These are essential prerequisites if mankind is to flourish, and be able to work with dignity, in security, without having to live in fear, need or poverty.

The Chinese scholar Lao-Tzu said that true words are never beautiful and that beautiful words are never true. This is why instead of indulging in rhetoric, I would like, with you all, to assess the experience gained in the ILO not just in the light of the lofty principles which guide the Organization but rather in the light of how these principles have been implemented on the ground and concrete achievements made.

The legacy of our Organization today is the basis on which we will build our future. I see that by building up a system of international standards, the ILO has, step-by-step, been able to meet the objectives enshrined in its mandate and that it has done this with skill, patience, but above all, because this is the vital ingredient, with tenacity and conviction. These human qualities which have enhanced the credibility of the Organization over the years, have made it possible for the Organization to carry out its difficult, sometimes impossible task, namely to build up the trust of nations during its most difficult missions. The ILO has taken decisive measures in order to harmonize working conditions throughout the world. It has also contributed to strengthening workers' rights and protection, improving social conditions and promoting, I repeat and cannot repeat often enough, promoting human dignity.

Today the ILO is no longer the only Organization to claim to be willing and able to act in this field because throughout the world, even if we welcome the progress of democracy, we can still see that peace is still under threat in many areas and that unemployment, hunger and poverty have not been overcome – far from it, and fundamental rights are under serious threat. Without these rights, there can be no dignity at work or social security, and other organizations, as well as States, are participating in the conquest or reconquest of what must be overthrown to enjoy the feeling of hope we have attained.

In view of past successes which however do not go far enough, what is the future task of the ILO strengthened by 75 years of achievements and experience? I see this future as, first and foremost, a time of action rather than submission when we will be duty bound to act rather than to react, to act rather than give in. This means we must be wary of activism that is rich in words but poor in action and avoid having to give in before we have even tried; we must be on top of situations, and in control before they arise. The International Labour Organization is not a contemplative order, it must continue its active role – act rather than give in, act rather than react. It should prepare events and act before a situation arises. This is the two-fold requirement for the future of our dear Organization.

I see this future as being organized along four main lines. Firstly, we should recall that the fundamental ideals of the pioneers because they have not all been realized must continue to be the stimulus and driving force of our Organization.

The need of the individual for a greater measure of freedom, justice, dignity, for work under humane conditions and for social security is just as urgent in 1994 as it was in 1919 or in 1944. It is this reminder of the underlying principles that motivate our action which should, to my mind, serve as the driving force of our Organization's future.

I should like to stress the exceptional and particularly welcome nature of the resources available to our Organization. We are familiar with them of course. They are practically taken for granted in our Organization, but we must recall their value beyond the Organization itself. The tripartite character of the ILO, embracing governments, workers and employers, is a very modern and up-to-date approach, indispensable for the future social development of our various countries on a world scale, but also on a continental and national scale.

This Organization is all the more indispensable in a rapidly changing world, in which individualism, which is welcome in some respects, and polarization, which is less welcome, constitute the focus of our action, which must be balanced on the basis of a consensus emerging from the tripartite source of our ideas and our decisions.

Our national and international societies are, in many cases, at the end of the twentieth century, in a state of conflict or on the verge of collapse. The tripartite organization of the ILO reminds us of the vital need for convergence, without which there can be no solid human or social construction. This is the second key to the future of our Organization: not so much a cult of the tripartite approach as respect and understanding for the extremely topical significance of this type of approach and of associated processes of reflection and decision-making.

The third main thrust concerns the search for and the development and consideration of standards which, to my mind, must be more robust. To fulfil our mission in the future, we must perhaps expect the ILO to produce fewer but better standards than those that we have devised in the past: standards adapted to the new conditions and circumstances prevailing in the world today, and which, because they are better, will be better accepted, experienced and received as a general discipline to which we submit, not out of necessity or constraint but willingly, in a positive and creative spirit.

Lastly, the fourth key to the future of the Organization is that of a more ambitious universal social framework than in the past, namely the economy. The economy, and more importantly labour, are ideally in the service of mankind. The objective for which we must strive is that social discrimination and differences between rich and poor peoples are scaled down and finally eliminated.

A crucial step has been taken in this direction after many years of laborious negotiations with the conclusion of the Uruguay Round of GATT in April this year. But although it is generally agreed that this is a great opportunity for jump-starting the world economy through the strengthening of the multilateral system, we must none the less recognize that this economic boost is insufficient to absorb all of the unemployed.

I, therefore, consider that in addition to its traditional mission our Organization must wholeheartedly go along with this process of globalization and restructuring of the world economy and of the gradual liberalization and globalization of world trade.

The new international distribution of labour, which places workers in all regions of the world in direct competition, should offer our Organization the opportunity to be strong and to take rigorous steps to ensure the harmonization of conditions of work and social security throughout the world. In particular, emphasis must be placed on labour standards associated with trade with a view to opening a dialogue with the future World Trade Organization.

I have noted that our fields of competence are not disputed but rather shared with other organizations. I am deeply involved in this issue and this approach, which are vitally important for the ILO's future. The ILO must be the ideal partner of the future WTO, and of the World Bank, the IMF, UNCTAD or the OECD, to cite only a few of the international organizations whose basic objectives of economic globalization must be accompanied by a heightened social awareness.

The ILO must be the cornerstone of the World Summit for Social Development in March 1995 and of the follow-up activities that ensue from this flagship event for the organization of tomorrow's world.

I am therefore launching a strong appeal for a robust ILO in the future. I also urge our Organization to coordinate action with its international sisters.

Lastly, I appeal to our Organization and its constituents to seize the tremendous opportunity available to them and to us to make the ILO the social conscience of tomorrow's world. The GATT negotiations finally succeeded because the political will was there. The ILO must also summon up the necessary political will, as it has done so successfully in the 75 years since its foundation, but with greater energy and at a higher level in order to continue to fulfil its mission in this field and with the new dimension that the future holds.

The ILO must be the driving force of this essential worldwide effort of reflection and in order to prevent decisions from being made in its absence, it must engage in meticulous conscientious and long-term work.

In this spirit, I urge the ILO to spell out as soon as possible the substance of the fundamental social rights that have been ratified by all and universally accepted. I also urge it to improve available means for implementing those rights and to extend its hand to its as yet unknown sister, the World Trade Organization, so that supervision of the relevant multilateral standards takes place on a commonly agreed basis.

Our societies are on the move. People are throwing off their chains. Young people in all countries are looking towards new shores where they may hoist the banner of hope, the symbol of success represented by access to decent jobs; the less young should also remain active in order to enrich the world of work with their skills and experience.

The ILO must play a leading role in this new world. As its social conscience, it should endeavour to make it a more humane place, inspiring every individual with hope, reminding governments of the need for strict compliance with their commitments and encouraging the social partners to find new and imaginative solutions and to become involved in defining the social framework of future world trade.

Switzerland is proud to be the seat of the ILO and to welcome here each year this world parliament of labour: your Conference, our Conference. Switzerland will make every effort to ensure that Geneva remains the focus of this moral, economic and social awareness so that Switzerland and Geneva further strengthen their role, conferred on them by the presence of the international organizations on their territory, as a meeting place and a place of rapprochement between all men and women.

This morning's ceremony is highly significant, as a celebration, the 75th anniversary of an organization which, despite the vicissitudes of world history, has been able to maintain its momentum and its firm political will to place its potential at the service of freedom and human dignity.

Happy 75th birthday to the International Labour Organization. May it continue along its present path, a path that contributes to world peace.

The PRESIDENT – Mr. Delamuraz, on behalf of the Conference and indeed on behalf of the International Labour Organization, I want to thank you for your very inspiring, interesting and informative commentary. We look forward to our next 75 years; with the inspiration and good wishes you have extended to us, I am sure it will be a very fruitful period. Thank you again.

It is now my pleasure to give the floor to a gentleman who needs no introduction, the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne.

Original French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – Mr. Federal Councillor, Ladies and Gentlemen representing the Canton and City of Geneva, Ladies and Gentlemen, special guests of the Conference, Mr. President, the Vice-Presidents, Ministers, Delegates, Ladies and Gentlemen. To commemorate the past is first and foremost to pay tribute to it. To pay tribute to 75 years of commitment to social justice, we must first vow to pursue the ideal which inspired our predecessors and determine how to put that ideal into practice in the world of today and tomorrow.

In the past five years the world has changed drastically. It is an open world, replete with promises and opportunities. It is also a confused world fraught with dangers, and it is in this changing and sometimes crazy world that we must perform our task. It is our world and our changes must keep pace with its changes. The time has come for us to make choices. The title of the report that I have the honour to present to you traces the path which I propose that we should follow: making the necessary changes to enable us to continue to defend the values in which we believe.

To make these changes we must first evaluate three things: our tripartite structure, our programmes of activities, and our place and role in the international system.

First, let us focus on tripartism, the product of the intuitive genius of the founders of our Organization. In 1919, for the first time in history, but also for the last time, an international organization recognized the existence of civil society by involving that society in all stages of its decision-making process. This stroke of enlightened genius was to become the main feature of the ILO and to mark both its organization and its methods of work. It must be acknowledged, however, that despite the efforts made by the ILO during its 75 years of existence, tripartism has by no means become a universally accepted value, let alone a universally practised one. This makes the paradox with which we are faced today all the more astonishing.

On the one hand, following the collapse of communism and of very many rightist dictatorships, the chances of establishing authentic tripartism, one based on the genuine independence of the social partners and their ability to negotiate, have never been so great both in the East and in the South. And yet at the same time the faith of the countries of the North in the very process which permitted them to establish democracy is wavering under the pressure of various factors. The representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations is being called into question along with their ability to conclude major labour agreements. This is the first challenge we face because the efficiency of the ILO depends first of all on the existence of active, effective and open-minded tripartism in all our member States. Three issues are particularly worthy of our attention.

First, we must support the establishment of free and responsible employers' and workers' organizations throughout the world. We must set up machinery to facilitate and strengthen collective bargaining and social dialogue by these organizations, and we must continue to provide training in this field. Our efficiency will also increasingly depend on the possibility of cooperating within each member State with a person at the ministerial level capable of being a real driving force for this policy of tripartism both in respect of labour questions and in respect of employment.

Such close collaboration with the tripartite constituents of the ILO in each member State, together with their constant support, constitutes the very essence of the policy for active partnership that we are now pursuing.

This policy represents the natural progression in the intensive participation of the ILO in the development cooperation activities of the United Nations system. Basically, it entails ensuring that our constituents have the necessary means to fulfil their responsibilities and offering the timely guidance and technical advice they are entitled to expect from us to solve the problems they encounter.

Lastly, it seems to me that the tripartite bodies of the ILO should endeavour to unite and cooperate to the maximum degree with all groups and associations concerned with social problems so as to continue to be the social conscience of the world and of the United Nations system. Mr. Delamuraz appealed to us to do just that in his statement a few moments ago.

But the weakening of tripartism and the hampering of social dialogue are unquestionably closely linked with the scope and lasting nature of the economic crisis. That crisis cannot be understood without referring to world economic upheavals.

The globalization of the economy has in recent years advanced with dazzling speed. The development of world trade in goods and services, of the international flow of capital, of the role of foreign investment in the building up of the national product, the growing interconnection of financial markets and the increasing role of multinational enterprises in economic activity bear witness to this. The ability of nation States to influence economic policy is seriously undermined by this internationalization of investment and international cash flows, as well as by the ease with which production can be transferred. The process of internationalization also reveals the limitations of the current instruments for regulating economic and social activities. It is becoming increasingly difficult for collective bargaining at the national level to achieve satisfactory results. The numerous failures of collective bargaining undermine consultation mechanisms and even threaten the social partners themselves.

On the other hand, the globalization of trade is giving rise to unprecedented and widespread social problems. Inequality is persisting and worsening, and new types of inequality are emerging between States and within them. No country can be sure of remaining untouched by serious social problems such as rising unemployment and spreading poverty.

What activities should we be promoting in this new environment?

The International Labour Organization became known at first as an institution to turn to in the field of labour law. A substantial proportion of its activities was devoted to building up an international labour code. Its achievements are remarkable and unquestionably still relevant today. It is, however, becoming increasingly risky to promote the protection of labour without simultaneously taking into account the obligation of States to promote employment. In other words, one cannot undertake an analysis of labour legislation without giving detailed consideration to economic policy. We must therefore concentrate, both on the right to work and on labour law.

This appears to me to imply a certain degree of refocusing of our standard-setting activity. First of all, we need to choose as themes for new international labour standards only those subjects we believe to be truly essential. We should also reinforce the supervision by the Organization of the respect by member States of certain basic social rights by using a procedure similar to that which already exists to examine complaints of violation of freedom of association. This could apply to discrimination in employment or forced labour. We might also envisage new means of action, such as the creation of a standing international body for mediation and voluntary arbitration. This would be entirely consistent with the ideas of the founders of the ILO, and often repeated since: violations of the Organization's standards should be ended by means of persuasion and dialogue.

We should also be more active in the field of employment. I propose that the Office should draw up an annual report containing a carefully researched factual analysis of the world employment situation and the effects of economic and financial policies on it. The aim of this report would be to define means to promote a fair distribution of wealth by developing employment in a more open context of increased trade relations and freer movement of capital. The need to adapt to change is obvious, but we must also assess the effectiveness of adjustment policies as they relate to employment, standards of living and working conditions.

On the basis of this work, the International Labour Conference – and indeed the Governing Body – should ensure that employment is constantly on its agenda in order to assert its international authority in this respect.

This leads me to the third issue which we should be examining at this Conference. What is our role on the international scene?

As I have said, the liberalization of trade and international movement of capital offers the world reasonable prospects for economic growth, increasing employment and declining poverty, but in no way does it guarantee an automatic improvement of social justice. The international community must attach much greater importance to the social aspects of globalization, and must take them fully into account when introducing machinery and measures to ensure adequate control over the world economy.

For example, the globalization of the economy has highlighted the problem of linkage of fair labour standards and international trade. That is the issue of the social clause.

Today, I do not think that we can avoid discussion of this issue any longer. In my Report to the International Labour Conference, I have striven to initiate a free and open debate on the subject of the social clause. Since then, the signing of the Uruguay Round agreements has made the subject still more urgent.

I am convinced that it is consistent with my role, and with the role of the International Labour Office, to endeavour to promote better mutual understanding in order to prevent that this debate, whether it is taking place in the World Trade Organization, the GATT or the ILO, should lead to the adoption of intransigent or even restrictive positions – a shouting match with allegations of social dumping on the one hand and disguised protectionism on the other. The fresh impetus given to multilateral cooperation by the Uruguay Round agreements unquestionably offers an unprecedented opportunity to the international community of progressing in this debate, an opportunity we must not fail to seize.

It is the duty of the international community to work out a multilateral approach to this problem, failing which free reign will be given to the discretionary power of one or more States. A multilateral approach must, in clear terms, pursue the twofold goal of enhancing respect for workers' rights and promoting social progress everywhere in the world, which implies that everyone has a right to development.

I am convinced that such an approach must be based on the principles already accepted by the international community. These include the ILO Conventions relating to basic human rights, such as the Conventions guaranteeing freedom of association and collective bargaining and those which forbid forced labour. These Conventions have been adopted freely by the International Labour Conference and they have been widely ratified by the great majority of countries. All countries, irrespective of their level of development, can, if they have the political will to do so, observe the principles of these instruments.

The ILO also has the technical equipment it needs to deal with these matters: its tripartite structure, its procedures for framing international labour rules, its detailed knowledge and experience of these problems and, above all, machinery respected the world over for the impartial and strict supervision of the application of these rules by the member States. Making optimum use of our heritage will offer the best guarantee of a multilateral response to this great challenge. Indeed, the effectiveness of ensuring social orientation for world trade depends essentially, in my opinion, on the effectiveness of active tripartism in member States.

In referring to the problem of the relationship between trade and the demands of social justice, I am prompted to refer to the role of the ILO on the international scene today.

In the institutional system set up after the War, a very clear division was created between, on the one hand, the main economic and financial institutions, those known as the Bretton Woods institutions, i.e., the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and, on the other hand, the United Nations agencies with a social mandate, such as the International Labour Organization. Since then, the gap that separates them has simply widened. Undoubtedly, efforts have been made to forge links between these institutions but these links are, at the very least, tenuous.

I think the time has come to forge close and firm links between these institutions. One cannot envisage social progress without considering economic and financial policies, and these economic and financial policies cannot be formulated without taking into account their social implications, or the effect will be to worsen these problems, rather than resolving them.

We do not need to create new institutions. What we need is to create new forms of synergy between existing institutions which would help them to work closer together in order to bring about true political cooperation. This new form of cooperation, I believe, implies the establishment of a dual mechanism with a technical aspect and a political aspect.

As far as the technical aspect is concerned, the main international agencies responsible for economic, financial and social problems such as the IMF, the World Bank, the future WTO and the ILO must organize themselves flexibly in order to prepare each year a set of recommendations which are aimed at guaranteeing better functioning of the world economy, with the prospect of creating greater well-being for the greatest number of people.

Politically speaking, these recommendations will be submitted for approval to a representative ministerial meeting. The Jobs Summit held in Detroit organized by the G7 seems to me to be exemplary in this field. It brought together those responsible for finances and economic affairs with ministers of labour.

This ministerial meeting could be patterned on the model of the Interim Committee of the IMF which is already accustomed to issuing such recommendations. The committee could be extended on this occasion to include ministers responsible for trade and ministers of employment and labour.

The World Summit for Social Development which is to be held next year following the 50th anniversary of the United Nations, should be an opportunity to finalize these new international mechanisms in order to analyse and monitor new trends and situations at the global level, to give advice on this subject and to prepare integrated economic and social policies aimed at solving social problems.

The ILO must be closely implicated in these mechanisms. Having received as a general mandate the task of promoting social justice it should be recognized that its particular responsibility is to work along these lines with organizations active on the international economic scene, whether it be in development, finance or commerce.

I am not trying to claim a particular place for our Organization. It is simpler than that. It is a legitimate attempt to try to make a contribution to the solution of problems which are leaving the world in disarray. We must help politicians to respond and to answer the question which many people are asking them: Where does social justice come in their lists of concerns? No one can accept a situation whereby the law of the jungle continues to be imposed on so many men and women and is even receiving a new impetus under the banner of generalized competition. If we were to allow competition to develop in an unbridled manner, we would be undermining the positive developments which have emerged over the last few years.

For a tree to continue extending its branches, it needs roots which are very deeply embedded in the soil. The same goes for this Organization. With our present 171 member States, we have never before been such a universal Organization. In order to serve the world in which we live today we must change what has to be changed, but in a spirit of fidelity to our past by drawing on it to serve our current needs.

By proceeding in this way in Philadelphia 50 years ago our predecessors brought about the first rebirth of our Organization. It is along the same lines that I call upon you all to work today on what I do not hesitate to call the second rebirth of the International Labour Organization.

The PRESIDENT – On my own behalf, and on behalf of the officers of the Conference, I wish to thank the Secretary-General for his inspiring words.

I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – Mr. President, if you will allow me now, I invite you as well as the Vice-Presidents, and Mr. Delamuraz and Mr. Hansenne to open officially the Golden Book which has been put at the disposal of all the delegates and to sign it. This Golden Book will be open during this session of the Conference and all delegates who speak in this plenary will be invited to sign it.

(The Golden Book is signed.)

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

President: Mr. Gray

SUBMISSION OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF THE GOVERNING BODY TO THE CONFERENCE BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE GOVERNING BODY

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda this afternoon is the presentation of the annual report of the Governing Body of the ILO. I give the floor to Mr. Nkomo, Chairman of the Governing Body, to present his oral report.

Mr. NKOMO (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – In accordance with article 14, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders of the Governing Body, I have the honour to report to the International Labour Conference on the work of the Governing Body during the preceding year. This is the first time that an oral report of this kind has been presented to you; in previous years the Conference always had before it a written report adopted by the Governing Body itself at its May Session just before the Conference, and the Chairman merely updated the report. However, since the May Session has been abolished in the framework of the reforms in the functioning of the Governing Body which were introduced last year, it now befalls the Chairman of the Governing Body to report orally to the Conference on the work carried out by the Governing Body during the whole of the preceding year. My report will therefore cover the proceedings of the Governing Body at its post-Conference 257th Session in June 1993, 258th Session in November 1993 and 259th Session in March 1994. Without entering into excessive administrative details, I shall highlight the main decisions and debates of the Governing Body at those sessions, particularly those which affect the work of the International Labour Conference. I should also add that, as required by article 14, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders of the Governing Body, I have consulted the two Vice-Chairmen on the contents of my report.

As you know, elections took place at the 80th Session of the Conference last year to renew the membership of the Governing Body for the 1993-96 period. The reconstituted Governing Body met for the first time at the 257th Session on 23 June 1993. It began by electing its Officers for the 1993-94 year. I had the honour of being elected Chairman, and Mr. Oechslin and Mr. Brett were elected Employer and Worker Vice-Chairmen respectively. The Governing Body then proceeded to organize its work. The renewal of its membership in fact provided an ideal opportunity to put into effect the new arrangements resulting from the far-reaching reforms in its functioning which the Governing Body had adopted in May 1993.

These reforms involved, in particular, changes in the timing and length of its sessions, a thorough reorganization of its committee structure and the redistribution of work between the Governing Body, its committees and its Officers, and changes in methods of work notably with a view to streamlining its work and enabling the Governing Body to concentrate more on its essential decision-making and policy guidance functions. While the new structure is still in an experimental stage and may need to be adjusted further in the light of experience, I believe these changes have, on the whole, been positive and have contributed to a considerable streamlining of the work of the Governing Body.

Henceforth, the Governing Body will hold two main sessions per year – an autumn session in November and a spring session in March or early April, together with a brief one-day session immediately following the Conference to elect the Officers, examine the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association and consider any urgent business which cannot await the autumn session. Now that the one-week session in May has been done away with, the work of the Governing Body has been redistributed between the autumn and the spring sessions, and this has in particular produced a major change in the timetable for deciding the agenda for the International Labour Conference.

Previously, the Director-General's proposals for the agenda of a given Conference session were first discussed by the Governing Body in May – two years before the session concerned – and the final decision was taken in November, i.e., 18 months before that session. Henceforth, the first stage of the discussion – to identify subjects from which agenda items are to be selected – will take place at the autumn session, two-and-a-half years before the related Conference session, and the decision will be taken at the following spring session, i.e. some 27 months preceding the Conference. This new timetable has the advantage of giving the Office and ILO constituents more time to carefully prepare standards; moreover, governments will have longer to consult the social partners and prepare their replies to ILO questionnaires.

Since the 1993-94 biennium marked the transition between the old and the new agenda-setting procedures for the Conference, the Governing Body was exceptionally required during this period, to set the agendas for two successive sessions of the Conference. Therefore, at its 258th (November 1993) Session, the Governing Body not only decided the agenda of the 82nd (1995) Session of the Conference, but also started discussing proposals for the agenda of the 83rd (1996) Session of the Conference; during its 259th (March 1994) Session, it made the final decisions on the 1996 Conference agenda.

For 1995, the Governing Body decided that, in addition to the standing items for the Conference and the technical item on safety and health in mines which would be carried over from 1994 for second discussion, the following items would be placed on the agenda: (a) home work (first discussion); and (b) extending the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) to activities in the non-commercial sector (single discussion).

For the 1996 Conference agenda, apart from standing items and second discussion of the standard-setting item on home work, the two following topics were selected for general discussion: (a) employment policies in a global context; and (b) tripartite consultation at the national level on economic and social policy.

Other matters which were considered directly by the Governing Body during the reporting period relate to preliminary consultations on the Programme and Budget for 1996-97, the work of the ILO's regional conferences and questions relating to special procedures under the ILO Constitution.

The practice of holding a preliminary consultation on the programme and budget proposals for the following biennium one year in advance of the detailed consideration and approval of those proposals was inaugurated at the 245th (February-March 1990) Session of the Governing Body in connection with the preparation of the Programme and Budget for 1992-93. This exercise – which was found extremely useful in setting the main priorities and providing the Office with the policy guidance needed for preparing the detailed programme and budget proposals – was repeated in February 1992. On both occasions, the process of consultation was undertaken through the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body. This year, the task of setting the main guidelines for the preparation of the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 was taken directly by the Governing Body at its March 1994 Session. However, the discussion has not yet been completed; in view of the major debate on the future of the ILO to take place at this year's Conference on the basis of the Report of the Director-General, the Governing Body has decided to revert to an examination of the main policy issues to be addressed in the preparation of the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 in light of the discussion of the Director-General's Report by the Conference; the Governing Body's discussion of this issue will therefore be resumed at its 260th Session on 25 June this year.

As regards the original dimensions of the ILO activities, the Governing Body plays an important role in convening ILO regional conferences, deciding on the agenda and functioning, and ensuring follow-up. A major event during the past year was the Eighth African Regional Conference in Mauritius from 19 to 26 January 1994. As Chairman of the Governing Body, and coming myself from the African region, it was a particular honour and pleasure for me to open that Conference, which proved to be an outstanding success, not least of all due to the generosity and efficiency of our Mauritian hosts. The Eighth African Regional Conference adopted conclusions on entrepreneurship and small enterprise development in urban and rural sectors. It held a general discussion on social security and social protection during periods of structural adjustment change, and adopted a series of resolutions on: ILO technical cooperation in Africa; structural adjustment and development in Africa; South Africa; the devaluation of the CFA franc; and promoting the advance of democracy in Africa. At its 259th (March 1994) Session, the Governing Body endorsed all these texts and decided on the follow-up to be given to them. At the same session, it also took decisions on the next meeting in the cycle of regional conferences, i.e. the Fifth European Regional Conference which it decided to convene in Warsaw from 20 to 27 September 1995. On the recommendations of its European members the Governing Body decided to place on the agenda of that conference one policy theme, namely the strengthening of tripartite structures for the development of active employment policy, and one technical subject, the coverage and the financing of social protection. The Fifth European Regional Conference will complete the cycle of regional conferences held according to the new organizational pattern, which was begun in Bangkok in December 1990 and was continued in Caracas and Mauritius, and the Governing Body will proceed to examine, on the basis of experience acquired so far, what further improvements should be made in the functioning of regional conferences.

As regards standard-setting work, I shall report to you on the main decisions in the field when I come to the work of the individual committees. However, the Governing Body deals directly, on the advice of its Officers, with special procedures initiated under articles 24 and 26 of the ILO Constitution. At its 257th (June 1993) Session, the Governing Body declared receivable a representation under article 24 of the Constitution, alleging non-observance by Poland of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and set up a tripartite committee to examine it. Similarly, article 24, representations alleging the non-observance by Brazil of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), and non-observance by Guatemala, of the same two Conventions were declared receivable by the Governing Body in November 1993 and March 1994 respectively. Two committees were established to examine them. In November 1993, the Governing Body approved the report and findings of the committee which it had earlier set up to examine a representation alleging non-observance by Sweden of the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121), and declared closed the procedure initiated under that representation.

As I mentioned at the outset, reforms of the functioning of the Governing Body, adopted in May 1993, entailed in particular a major restructuring of the Governing Body's standing committees, the number of which was reduced from ten to six. With the exception of the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, which remained unchanged, the existing committees were abolished and their functions were entrusted to four new bodies: the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards, the Committee on Employment and Social Policy, the Committee on Technical Cooperation, and the Committee on Sectoral and Technical Meetings and Related Issues. At its post-conference session in June last year, the Governing Body determined the terms of reference and composition of these committees, and the new committees met for the first time in November 1993.

As you know, the Committee on Freedom of Association plays a key role in ensuring respect for the basic ILO Conventions relating to freedom of association and other trade union rights. At the November 1993 and March 1994 Sessions, the Committee examined a total of 64 cases in substance. A few salient features of its work deserve to be highlighted.

Firstly, the number of pending cases at those two sessions has reached record levels (113 and 110 cases, respectively). The trend observed in recent years with regard to the type of issues raised in these complaints has been confirmed: an increasing number of cases concern complex industrial relations issues in connection with collective bargaining, labour disputes, etc., whereas the share of complaints relating to violations of human rights had diminished relatively. Besides the cases which it examined in substance, the Committee also considered the follow-up given by governments to its earlier recommendations in 29 cases, and it was able to note favourable developments in the observance of trade union rights in several countries and, in particular, Argentina, Kenya and Zambia.

Finally, in March 1994, the Committee on Freedom of Association submitted to the Governing Body a report on the measures taken by the Government of South Africa to give effect to the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association and, in accordance with the applicable procedure, this report was transmitted to the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations.

In view of the importance and urgency of the cases it deals with, the Committee on Freedom of Association is the only committee which meets three times a year. It held its last meeting last week on 1 and 2 June and its report will be considered by the Governing Body at its 260th Session immediately following this Conference.

The new Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards has taken over most of the functions of the former Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Committee on Discrimination.

As regards legal issues, the Committee examined at the 258th (November) Session the practical and standing orders implications of the reforms set out in the final report of the Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference. In relation to the work cycle of preparations for the Conference, the Governing Body recommends that the Conference amend portions of its Standing Orders that deal with the preparatory stages of single and double-discussion procedures (article 38, paragraphs 1 and 3, and article 39, paragraphs 1 and 2). In the case of a double discussion, this would mean that first reports would reach governments 18 months before the opening of the Conference session, and that governments would have three additional months to prepare their replies to the Office questionnaire. The Governing Body decided in principle that any second discussion of an item placed on the agenda of the Conference for revision in place of a general discussion should be undertaken at the next budget session following the first discussion, and that consideration be given later to amending the Conference Standing Orders in the light of experience. It was agreed that the statement of existing law and practice would be submitted to the Governing Body only where the matter of the subject required it.

At its 259th Session, the Governing Body decided that in general an electronic voting system would be used again in 1994 for the various methods of voting in plenary set out in the article 19 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, and that it could also be employed on the Resolutions Committee for the vote on the priority order of resolutions if the necessary facilities were made available. In the light of a situation which had arisen at the 1993 Conference, the Governing Body endorsed a practice to deal with a resolution which has been deposited on time but before the submission of its author's credentials to the Conference. On another topic, the Governing Body asked to be kept informed of developments related to a report it had examined on the external competence of the European Community and the ILO's standard-setting activities following the opinion delivered by the Court of Justice of the European Communities. It also approved the Standing Orders for the forthcoming Tripartite Meeting on Maritime Labour Standards.

With regard to the application of international labour standards, the Governing Body approved at its 258th November 1993 Session the report for the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993 (No. 174) adopted by the Conference at its past session. It also selected the following Conventions and Recommendations for reporting under article 19 of the Constitution: in 1995, the Labour Administration Convention (No. 150) and Recommendation (No. 158), 1978; and in 1996, the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention (No. 159) and Recommendation (No. 168), 1983.

At the same session, the Governing Body adopted a series of measures concerning the adjustment of the ILO's regular supervisory procedures, which essentially concern the frequency of reports. These adjustments are described in paragraph 115 of the Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations which you have before you at this session (Report III (Part 4A)). In addition, the date of the Committee of Experts' meeting has been changed and will in future be set for the first two weeks of December. The new arrangements will come into operation in 1995 and will be reviewed after a trial period of five years.

On matters relating to discrimination and other human rights issues, the Governing Body has decided to give particular attention at its November 1994 session to the preparation of the 1995 Fourth World Conference on Women.

At its November 1993 session the Governing Body noted the adoption of the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action at the World Conference on Human Rights and regretted that the ILO had not been consulted more fully. At its March 1994 session, it was informed of continuing consultations with the United Nations on how to implement the Declaration and on the appointment of the High Commissioner on Human Rights.

The Governing Body discussed, in November 1993, the progress of South Africa's efforts to achieve full democracy and to abolish apartheid. It decided at that session to suspend the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, and adopted a plan of action for ILO assistance to South Africa after the installation of a democratic government. This discussion was held in the presence of a tripartite multi-racial delegation from the National Manpower Commission of South Africa. In March 1994, it noted further progress and also decided that the ILO should immediately make a contribution to voters' education before the holding of the multi-racial parliamentary elections in April 1994. Following all these positive developments, it is now a great pleasure for us all to welcome South Africa back in the ranks of the ILO.

At its March 1994 Session, the Governing Body again decided in favour of holding a special sitting at the 81st (1994) Session of the Conference for the consideration of the Director-General's Report on the Situation of Workers of the Occupied Arab Territories along the same lines as the special sittings organized at the preceding sessions of the Conference. Proposals in this regard will be made to you by the Selection Committee of the Conference. The Governing Body also took note at the same session of a report on ILO activities in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

The Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards has established a Subcommittee on Multinational Enterprises, responsible for monitoring ILO work relating to multinational enterprises and, in particular, the effect given to the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy.

At its 258th Session in November 1993, the Governing Body launched the sixth survey on the effect given to the Tripartite Declaration which will cover four years – (1992, 1993, 1994 and 1995) – by approving the questionnaire for this survey and inviting the Director-General to send it to governments, employers' and workers' organizations with a view to receiving replies by the end of February 1996. At the same session, the Governing Body noted with satisfaction the promotional activities, completed publications, and ongoing research carried out by the Office in the field. The Governing Body also took note of information on developments in other international organizations having instruments or programmes pertaining to multinationals and urged that links with these institutions be strengthened.

The Committee on Employment and Social Policy has taken over the former functions of the Committee on Employment with wider terms of reference covering most of the ILO's major technical programmes. The new committee met in November 1993 and March 1994, and has continued the earlier committee's practice of double discussion of technical issues. Thus in November 1993 it completed a second discussion of an item on active labour market policies in a wider context, and in March 1994 had a first discussion of the item on industrial relations and employment. In November 1993 the Committee also received a paper on patterns of employment growth and generally agreed that the regular presentation of a similar paper would be valuable. The particular paper could be helpful in preparing the ILO's contribution to the World Summit for Social Development. An agenda item foreseen for March 1994 on the employment and social impact of structural adjustment was postponed until November 1994.

The Committee now examines the effects to be given to various Conference resolutions which include follow-up to two resolutions adopted by the Conference in 1993 concerning social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy and concerning exposure to and safety in the use of biological agents at work, respectively. It also receives the reports of certain ILO meetings. The latter had included the Meeting of Experts on Working Time, the Tripartite Regional Meeting of Experts on Social Security in the Americas and the Symposium on Workers' Education and Environment, which all took place in October 1993.

In addition, the Committee has taken over from the previous International Organizations Committee responsible for matters related to the environment and development. In March 1994, it took note of an office paper which set out the action taken regarding the follow-up to agenda 21 adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in Rio de Janeiro in 1992.

Regular agenda items for November meetings of the Committee have included activities and collaboration with the Bretton Wood institutions in relation to structural adjustment and follow-up to the ILO High-level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment in 1987. In November 1993, a discussion on the latter item touched upon the possibility of convening a second high-level meeting in advance of the World Summit. In a subsequent Governing Body discussion a decision on holding a high-level meeting was postponed. Instead, one day will be set aside early in this session of the International Labour Conference – that is, this coming Friday, 10 June – for the ministers present as well as employers' and workers' representatives to discuss the paper which the ILO has been invited by the United Nations to submit to the second session of the Preparatory Committee of the World Summit for Social Development.

The Governing Body has continued to follow closely developments relating to the World Summit through the special working party which it has set up for that purpose. This concern has been – and continues to be – that the ILO experience and the views of its tripartite membership should be fully drawn upon and that the ILO should be given a central role in preparations for and the follow-up to the Summit. To this end, the Governing Body at its November 1993 Session, made a statement which was transmitted to the Preparatory Committee for the Summit and which contained the Governing Body's views on the issues to be addressed by it.

Subsequently, at its March 1994 Session, the Governing Body on the recommendations of the Working Party adopted a list of points to be transmitted to the United Nations for inclusion in a draft declaration and programme of action which the secretariat for the Summit will be submitting to the Preparatory Committee at its next session in August this year.

Through its new Committee on Technical Cooperation, which is the successor of the former Committee on Operational Programmes, the Governing Body at its November 1993 Session reviewed ILO technical cooperation in 1992-93 including action to be taken on the resolution and conclusions concerning the role of the ILO in technical cooperation adopted by the Conference in 1993.

The Governing Body requested the Director-General to report to the next meeting of the Committee on Technical Cooperation on the progress made: (a) in integrating environmental issues into ILO technical cooperation; and (b) in the implementation of the active partnership policy as it related to the technical cooperation programme with special emphasis on the assistance the new multidisciplinary teams have been able to give in this respect.

The Governing Body also requested the Director-General: (a) when making proposals for the agenda of the Conference in the future to bear in mind the request made in paragraphs 6 and 52 of the conclusions of the Conference to conduct a review of the ILO's technical cooperation programmes every five years; (b) to take fully account of the resolutions and conclusions in the future development of the technical cooperation programme to keep the Committee informed on the follow-up action taken through the periodic reports submitted and to seek the Committee's guidance on relevant issues as necessary; (c) to ensure that the strategy paper described in paragraph 23 of the conclusions is submitted to the Committee on Technical Cooperation at its next meeting.

The Governing Body also requested the Director-General to submit to it at regular intervals and, if feasible, on a yearly basis a progress report highlighting the principal issues taken by the ILO with a view to the progressive implementation of the United Nations General Assembly resolution 47/199 concerning triennial policy review of the operational activities for development within the United Nations system.

The Governing Body's new Committee on Sectoral and Technical Meetings and Related Issues, which has succeeded the former Industrial Activities Committee, is responsible for monitoring the ILO's sectoral activities and, in particular, for selecting, preparing and following up on the ILO's sectoral committees and similar meetings.

The Committee, which met both in November 1993 and March 1994, has made recommendations to the Governing Body on the follow-up to be given to four sectoral meetings and the composition of two meetings and on various other questions under its purview.

In March 1994, the Committee was called upon to launch an important review of the sectoral activities programme as provided for in the Programme and Budget for 1994-95 adopted at the 80th Session of the International Labour Office. This evaluation exercise covered the planning, preparation and follow-up of sectoral meetings, as well as other policy issues relating to these meetings. The Office submitted to the Committee for consideration a paper based on a wide consultation of governments, employers and workers' organizations and of participants at recent ILO sectoral meetings, a self-evaluation by the Office and an analysis of the sectoral distribution of employment and the review of the history of industrial meetings and of past reform efforts.

The Committee gave its full support to the maintenance of a sectoral activities programme, and agreed that changes were needed with regard to, inter alia, the proportion of resources allotted to meetings and to other means of action, or to the organization of meetings, which the Committee felt should be shorter and more focused.

In view of the number of issues requiring further consideration, and the need to take any agreed changes into account in the Programme and Budget for 1996-97, the Committee requested the Office to prepare a paper in the light of its discussions for submission to a Working Party of the Committee which would meet during the session of the Conference, and whose recommendations would be submitted to the Governing Body by the Committee, in November 1994.

Lastly, but not the least importantly, the Governing Body took a large number of decisions on programming, financial and staff questions through its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee (PFAC). I shall not go into very much detail here, as many of these questions will come before you from the Finance Committee of this Conference.

You all recall that in anticipation of potential income shortfalls in 1992-93, due to uncertainties as to the timely collection of contributions from some member States, the Governing Body had approved expenditure reduction, totalling US$30 million, at its November 1992 and February-March 1993 Sessions. The receipt of a substantial part of these contributions in the latter part of 1993 resulted in a plus surplus in the 1992-93 biennium, and this led the Governing Body in March 1994 to propose to the Conference, as an exceptional one-time measure, a partial waiver of article 18 of the Financial Regulations, so as to permit the use of a large part of this plus surplus for programme activities. At the same time, the Governing Body reviewed the provisions of the Financial Regulations governing cost surpluses and deficits.

The Governing Body decided to give effect to the proposal of the Building Subcommittee of the PFAC to build new premises for the ILO office in Islamabad, and in accordance with the authority delegated to it by the Conference to accept with gratitude the gift by the Government of Pakistan of a plot of land for this purpose. Following a visit on the spot by the Building Subcommittee, the Governing Body approved a detailed plan of work in March 1994.

In March 1994, the PFAC considered the procedure of the approval of the audited accounts resulting from the suppression of the May Session of the Governing Body, to which these accounts are traditionally submitted. It was decided that the PFAC and the Governing Body would hold a short meeting early during the Conference, and this Conference is due to take place on 11 June – this coming Saturday – to approve these accounts and transmit them to the Conference.

For its Government members, the PFAC also makes recommendations to the Governing Body and the Conference on allocation matters, and the Conference will have before it proposals relating to the scale of assessments in 1994-95, including rates of assessment for new member States which have joined the ILO over the past year.

On personnel matters, the Governing Body took a number of decisions, authorizing the Director-General to implement United Nations General Assembly resolutions relating to salaries and allowances of the General Service staff and staff in the Professional and higher categories.

As in previous years, the PFAC discussed in March 1994 the composition and structure of the staff of the ILO. The dialogue between the Committee and the Office on this issue is an important element in the ongoing efforts to correcting balances in the geographical, sex and age distribution of the ILO personnel, bearing in mind, of course, the paramount importance of having a staff of the highest professional quality.

Before concluding I should like to touch very briefly on the work of two important ILO institutions which report annually to the Governing Body on their work.

The activities of the International Training Centre of the ILO in Turin over the past year have been characterized by efforts to achieve greater energy with the work of the technical departments of the ILO, and to contribute to the implementation of the active partnership policy. At the same time, the Turin Centre is being used increasingly for the design and implementation of training projects for various agencies and programmes within the United Nations system. Following the visit to the Centre of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali in April 1993, who emphasized the importance of training for the achievement of economic and social objectives, and the contribution which the Turin Centre could make in this respect, a programme of action was drawn up by the Centre. This programme envisages cooperation with United Nations departments and programmes on training in a wide range of fields, including the promotion of human rights, United Nations Development Programme operational activities, the emergence of relief and humanitarian programmes, drug abuse control, and peace-keeping operations.

The programme of action was discussed and approved by the Board of the Centre on 18 March 1994, and subsequently endorsed by the Governing Body. In both instances, the representatives of governments and the social partners also noted the relevance of this programme in promoting the basic principles and values underlying the work of the ILO.

Finally, the legal status of the Centre was consolidated by the conclusion with the Government of Italy of the complementary agreement on the privileges and immunities of the International Training Centre of the ILO, which was approved by the Governing Body in November 1993.

The aims of the International Institute for Labour Studies, as endorsed by the Governing Body, are to open up new perspectives for ILO programmes, and to promote an informal dialogue between the tripartite constituents of the ILO, members of the ILO staff and external academic community. The Institute's programme focuses on the interaction between labour institutions and economic development. They are implemented through research networking seminars, lectures, publications and educational courses.

Three activities in 1993 deserve mention. First the Institute explored the implications of the economic globalization for labour policy, with particular reference to foreign direct investment and local and regional development. Special attention was given to the role of labour standards in industrial restructuring and globalization.

Secondly, the Institute organized a major symposium on poverty to bring together academics, members of the ILO constituency, and ILO staff to identify promising approaches for future ILO programmes, and to complement the ILO's contributions to the United Nations world Summit for Social Development in 1995.

Thirdly, the Institute inaugurated the ILO Nobel Prize lecture series to initiate contacts between the ILO and the international students' community.

In November 1993, the Governing Body endorsed the programme and approved the budget of the Institute for 1994/1995. As you will have seen from this necessarily selective account of main decisions and debates of the Governing Body over the past year, its work has been extremely rich and varied. It has also been carried out in a resolute spirit of reform as befits the executive body of an organization which is celebrating 75 years of existence this year, and is seeking new ways to adapt the structures and programmes to the challenge of the future.

Before closing my remarks, I owe a word of special gratitude to my fellow officers of the Governing Body, Mr. Oechslin, Employer Vice-Chairman, and Mr. Brett, Worker Vice-Chairman, whose valuable and friendly cooperation over the past year has greatly facilitated my task in conducting the proceedings of the Governing Body.

My thanks also go to the Director-General and his staff for their assistance to the officers and the Governing Body as a whole. But as may be more important, I wish to express my sincere appreciation to all members of the Governing Body for the support they offered the officers and for the understanding they demonstrated.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION

The PRESIDENT – I would like to thank Mr. Nkomo, Chairman of the Governing Body, for his report.

Before initiating the discussion on the Report of the Director-General, I should like first of all to make the following statement on behalf of the Officers of the Conference. This statement refers to the way in which we intend to discharge our duties and I am making it on behalf of all the Officers of the Conference in order to remind you of the principles which we propose to apply in guiding this discussion. These principles will be applied with the greatest possible uniformity to all speeches made by any speaker in the Conference. The principles by which we shall be guided were first established by the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the ILO and approved by the Governing Body and communicated to the Conference in 1967. They are set out in paragraphs 54 to 58 of its report which are reproduced in the Memorandum on the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, a copy of which you should all now have.

It is incumbent upon the Officers of the Conference to draw the attention of all delegates to the contents of paragraph 58, which reads as follows: "In periods of acute political tension the ILO has a twofold responsibility – to uphold the values of human freedom and dignity enshrined in its Constitution and to circumscribe rather than extend the area of international tension by ensuring the fullest possible degree of continued cooperation in pursuit of the objectives of the ILO. Every delegate to the International Labour Conference therefore has an obligation to the Conference to keep these considerations constantly in mind, and the President has an obligation to ensure that the Conference does not lose sight of them."

In the discharge of my duty, I draw the Conference's attention to these principles. In full agreement with my fellow Officers and on behalf of all of you, I urge all delegates to collaborate with us in applying these principles. In particular, we hope that every delegate will recognize that the Officers of the Conference are responsible for ensuring that these principles are observed.

My colleagues and I are determined to carry out this responsibility. Freedom of expression is a vital feature of the International Labour Organization. However, in order to exercise this right in a spirit of mutual respect, we all have to accept a certain amount of discipline if we want our work to be carried on in an appropriate way and be crowned with success. It is the duty of the President of the sitting to ensure that these principles are respected and the Officers of the Conference will not hesitate to intervene in this connection. In particular, if there are offensive or insulting remarks made about any Head of State or Government, or if personal insults are directed at any other delegate, the President will intervene immediately. At the Conference all delegates should use parliamentary language and respect the accepted procedure, refer only to items under discussion and avoid raising any question alien to these matters.

It is important that every delegate who wishes to make a reply to a statement should refrain from asking for the floor by raising a point of order. What he should do is inform the President of the sitting before that sitting finishes that he wishes to exercise his or her right of reply. A request for a right of reply should be addressed to the Officers during the sitting in which the government or delegation considers it should exercise its right of reply.

These requests should be transmitted to the President through the Clerk and not by asking for the floor at the sitting.

I wish to refer to the practice with regard to the exercise of the right of reply. The right of reply should refer only to the point under debate. It should be brief, not exceed two minutes and should not give rise to any further remarks. Lastly, it should be couched in correct and parliamentary language. Furthermore, I wish to point out that in order to avoid endless debate, it has been a practice of the Presidents to refuse to allow replies to a reply.

I wish furthermore to point out that in accordance with article 14, paragraph 6, of the Conference Standing Orders, as amended by the Conference at its 79th Session, the time-limit for speeches of delegates participating in the discussion on the Reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General should not exceed ten minutes. I therefore invite all delegates to concentrate their remarks on these Reports alone. The time available to the Conference for examination of its agenda being very short, particularly this year with the shortened Conference time, it is imperative that these provisions be strictly respected.

All delegates and ministers attending the Conference will no doubt wish to take into account in preparing their remarks this limit of ten minutes so that the President will not be obliged to withdraw the right to speak from a speaker before he has finished his speech.

May I also remind you that in accordance with established practice, the Officers and President organize the general discussion. In particular, it is up to the President to ensure respect for the principles and provisions of the Standing Orders to which I have just referred.

Concerning the special sitting on the situation of workers in the occupied territories, may I remind you that on the proposal of the Selection Committee, the Conference has decided to allow speakers who so wish to take the floor both on the general report and during the special sitting, it being understood that the subject to be discussed in that sitting would not be discussed in the debate on the remainder of the report. May I recall in that respect that it has been decided to close the list of speakers for the special sitting at 6 p.m. on Tuesday, 14 June.

Finally, it goes without saying that all the principles mentioned above also apply to the special sitting, except the time limit for speeches which, depending on the number of speakers, may be less than two minutes.

With your help and collaboration, we shall fully discharge all the responsibilities conferred upon us with a view to ensuring the proper conduct and success of the Conference, and we thank you in advance for your understanding.

One other point that I would like to make is that because of time constraints, when we call one speaker we shall also call the following speaker, and I would invite them to come and take a seat on the platform so that we do not lose time parading up and down the aisles. I would also ask the speaker when he or she finishes to sign the Golden Book before leaving the rostrum.

Original Spanish: Mr. ROSALES ARGUELLO (Minister of Labour, Nicaragua) – I would like to extend my sincere congratulations to the President of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, Mr. Charles Gray, on his election. I would like to begin, if I may, by invoking the memory of Albert Thomas and all the socialists who responded to the challenge of the Bolshevik Revolution in 1919 by enabling the West to set up the ILO to try to find solutions to the problems resulting from rampant liberalism.

As we all know, the causes of the First World War were rooted in the rise of economic imperialism, which resulted from the absolute liberalism prevalent at that time.

The tragic consequences for mankind, both in the spiritual and the material sense, are known to all. The tragedy for workers, who fought against the war in Socialist International congresses and were later pushed into the trenches to kill one another, are clear to everyone.

Unfortunately, it seems that history is repeating itself and, at the end of the century, we are again faced with a liberalistic way of thinking which is pushing the masses deeper into unemployment with every passing day.

Of course, there are some who believe that the liberalization of international trade and the movement of capital at a global level can create economic growth, generate employment and reduce poverty.

However, giving free rein to market forces does not guarantee in any way the elimination of unemployment, nor does it promote the welfare of society as a whole.

Europe began its stabilization and structural adjustment process in 1972 with the oil crisis and all other regions later followed suit. Latin America is undergoing that process now, as are as parts of Africa and Asia.

The phenomena of trade deregulation, economic liberalization and globalization of the economy have as a matter of course led to increased poverty and a widening of the gap between rich and poor. Thirty per cent of the world population is engaged in non-productive work; 120 million people are registered as unemployed; and 700 million are underemployed. These figures from the Director-General's Report speak for themselves. Governments and civil society, as represented here, must do some serious thinking, since these are figures that cannot be ignored.

The Director-General asks: "Is it still possible to believe in social justice when the law of the strongest is not only imposed on so many men and women throughout the world but is now being regarded as a virtue in the context of generalized and rampant competition?"

Well, I wonder whether it is not high time to put an end to these abuses and ensure that social justice prevails so that humankind can live in dignity in a world of peace and tranquillity.

I, personally, see signs of impending war. The escape valve when pressure from these problems mounts has always been war and although today's view of the world is unipolar, humanity is still haunted by the spectre of war. To make matters worse, whereas in the past settlements could be worked out among the supremacist belligerent countries, nowadays real power and decision-making capacity lies with the 37,000 multinational corporations, which are undermining the sovereignty of peoples.

Local wars have continued virtually unabated since the Second World War, as evidenced by the following list: the Korean War, the Viet Nam War, the China-Viet Nam War, the Algerian War, the war in the Middle East, wars between Israel and Palestine, Syria and Iraq, Egypt and Israel, the war in Sudan, the war between Syria and Lebanon, the war in Angola, the war between the Turks and the Kurds, the war in Afghanistan, the Iran-Iraq War, the Iraq-Kuwait War, the war in Yugoslavia and all the struggles fought by liberation movements in Africa, North Africa and Latin America (Nicaragua, El Salvador, Guatemala, Colombia, Peru, the Falklands and so on and so forth).

The world crisis has fuelled nationalist sentiment and we are witnessing an upsurge of nationalism. Fascist and chauvinist movements have gained ground. There is no telling whether the former socialist republics will not eventually become atomic powers or whether the Balkan conflict can be solved in the near future. Unemployment rates in those republics are extremely high although we all know that full employment was one of their major achievements in the past.

I feel that the Director-General's Report and the analysis of the world economic environment that he presents under the heading 'A changing world' should necessarily lead us to conclude that we must provide humanity through the ILO with sufficient means to ensure that the hopes that some of us cherish for a favourable turn of events may become a reality.

I believe that these changes in the world, undermining as they do the very existence of the International Labour Organization, present a challenge that we must take up, providing the ILO with all the machinery it needs to fulfil the mission for which it was founded: the promotion of social justice and peace in the world.

In this spirit, I feel that we should fully assume the implications of the passage quoted by the Director-General from the Declaration of Philadelphia, which states: "It is a responsibility of the International Labour Organization to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of this fundamental objective [social justice]."

The Secretariat of the ILO should, to my mind, be given the unconditional support of this assembly, at the level of ministers of labour, ministers for foreign affairs and the social and economic ministers of our governments, so that the World Summit for Social Development takes a decision requiring international financial bodies to coordinate their economic plans and programmes with the ILO with a view to mitigating and offsetting the social consequences of those policies.

The crisis is worldwide. With the exception of some Far Eastern and South-East Asian countries, all of us are recording high unemployment rates. The challenge facing all countries is how to solve the problem of achieving sustainable growth with equity and without inflation, growth which in practice produces employment and jobs that are consonant with human dignity and the basic rights of workers.

The representative of Japan to the World Bank said about a year ago that the efficient channelling and use of resources was not enough to solve the problems of unemployment and guarantee economic development, that social progress could not be ensured by giving free rein to international market forces. The international community would therefore have to attach greater importance to the social problems resulting from the globalization of the economy and the liberalization of trade. It was essential to establish machinery, standards and policies that would have an impact on the running of the world economy.

We developing countries are extremely distressed to see that inequalities in trade and development are becoming more entrenched and that North-South dialogue has been interrupted because some people no longer believe in the North-South dichotomy.

As debate is now more urgent than ever, especially with a view to having the social clause included in the GATT, the ILO must be given the means to establish rights and duties for the contracting parties through an international labour convention and to obtain a commitment from the States concerned, based on a balance of interests, to refrain from applying unilateral trade restrictions.

In the instrument signed in Morocco on 15 April the World Trade Organization provides for the inclusion of the social clause. The Director-General wonders in his Report about the possibility of intervention, inasmuch as the ILO has no constitutional power to prevent the ratifying States from having recourse to unilateral trade restrictions. The Director-General should be fully convinced that what he undertakes on behalf of peace and social justice will secure the support of this assembly without thereby snubbing either GATT or the World Trade Organization. How well he puts it himself: "It must be prepared to take risks, including the risk of being unpopular in certain circles."

We must be prepared to fight within the United Nations and the WTO itself to ensure that it is our Organization which administers and implements the social clause in the event of its being adopted.

The strength and credibility of the ILO and the preservation of values in a changing world will depend directly on and will be commensurate with the strength and the warmth of the support that we constituents of the ILO extend and owe to our Organization.

They will depend on the influence that we – ministries of labour, employers and workers – can exert in our countries so that the foreign and economic ministries intervene in the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen in 1995, giving their full support to the International Labour Organization so that it obtains the mandate for implementing the social clause included in the trade agreement.

Dialogue between the social partners and ministries of labour will build up our potential for influencing the framing of social and economic policies, which will also indirectly strengthen the position of the ILO.

In the face of this challenge, the legal scaffolding built over a period of 75 years of productive work, and whose validity is undisputed, has been placed in jeopardy. If our Organization fails to play the role assigned to it, leaving it instead to the WTO, and if it fails to bring the Conventions into line with prevailing circumstances, it will find that its very raison d'être is called in question.

It is also vitally important to point out that the Director-General's supranationally oriented proposal to send a representative on an ad hoc basis to solve socioeconomic conflicts is not a good idea.

Unfortunately, the proposal goes beyond Kelsen's idea of international law as a productive source of domestic law, since this would be a supranational solution involving direct intervention by an international organization in the settlement of internal conflicts.

In conclusion, I wish to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report and to remind the international community represented here that the fate of the ILO is in our hands and that the fighting potential of our Organization depends on our will to ensure that values have not lost their raison d'être and that the principles for which the ILO was founded continue to hold sway and recover their vigour and strength.

Mr. SANGMA (Minister for Labour, India) – I have immense pleasure in addressing this time-honoured institution, the International Labour Conference, for the fifth time. This Conference coincides with the year of the ILO's diamond jubilee. I am proud of being part of it for this special reason too.

At the outset, let me extend my warm felicitations to the President of the Conference on his election this jubilee year. I also take this opportunity to congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their election.

This Session of the Conference is meeting after the historic estabishment of a non-racial and democratic Government in South Africa headed by Mr. Nelson Mandela. It also marks the successful culmination of the 30-year campaign of the ILO against apartheid. This occasion is of special emotional significance to us in India because of the pioneering struggle against apartheid by the father of the nation, Mahatma Gandhi. I compliment the ILO on its success in this great struggle for social justice.

We have read with great interest the thought-provoking Report presented by the Director-General. The concept since the days of industrial revolution has been that employers and workers are not always equal partners and that, therefore, the State should throw its weight meaningfully with the weaker of the partners, namely labour. The expectation has also been that the State would be a model employer and a purveyor of equity. The State has generally intervened in the economy directly by running crucial commercial enterprises and by setting up inter alia a regime of regulations to provide labour protection. But experience shows that there are limits to the State being the model employer. Rigid regulatory regimes of labour protection have also often inhibited employment generation. Though unintentionally, the State, in the process of laying down and enforcing labour standards, has also tended to concentrate on the organized sector, majorities in the unorganized sector being still largely left out. This has had its impact over the years on the agenda of the ILO, the benefaction of which has not reached the millions of unorganized workers who as Naval H. Tata would say, have yet to receive their initial morsel of the benefits. He has also stated that it is the biggest social injustice perpetrated on such massive millions of our working population. The organized sector has constantly clamoured to gain more on the strength of the ILO's instruments in the name of social justice.

Tipping the balance in favour of the market in practical terms means the national programmes for privatization as well as deregulation. In this context the question to be asked is: Will the market adequately subserve the ends of equity and social justice while it may provide increased and new forms of employment?

Economic and structural reforms and the interplay of market forces result in the lowering of production costs through competition.

In the process, often labour does suffer. Manpower redundancies and job losses occur in the reorganized enterprises, even though in the economy as a whole, elsewhere, increased production and productivity may give rise to greater employment opportunities. Even where there is gain for some workers in terms of employment opportunities, the quality of such employment is not necessarily enviable. In the decentralized sector, employment is often marred by undesirable working conditions and an absence of social security. In other words, market factors do also tend to push workers from the organized into the unorganized sector with all the consequent inequities.

Inequity and lack of social justice, whether it be triggered and perpetrated by an inefficient State apparatus or by the market are equally inconsistent with the basic mandate of the ILO. This leads us to the position that the ILO's standard-setting function is as relevant as ever before, if not more. New forms of employment would need new forms of standards. In response to those who strongly urge that the ILO de-emphasize Conventions and Recommendations, I would say with all humility "Please go back to the basics", that is, "standards". The ILO cannot defend values by straying away from these basic standards.

True, standards have to square up with the real needs of the times and should be dynamic for that purpose. The means of achieving this dynamism is to continue the ongoing process and update them. There is need, too, for evaluating and consolidating the existing standards. The ILO has to evolve innovative fast-track procedures for work in this vital area. It is also clear that the compliance with standards should be improved.

I have immense faith in the ILO's supervisory machinery to monitor the application of labour standards. It has been built upon tripartite conditions, its force is a combination of voluntarism, persuasion and consensus. Therefore, it is credible. Credible systems should continue to be the ILO's weapons for securing labour protection. Any other formalized multilateral mechanism or institution that might be forged for the purpose of monitoring and enforcing labour protection, involving outside international players like the WTO, could unintentionally become an instrument of coercion over a period of time. The ILO can and should visibly impact on labour and social issues only to its present and already well-established linkages within the United Nations system, particularly the Economic and Social Council. This is what the ILO has been attempting to do, for example, in the context of the forthcoming World Summit for Social Development. In other words the ILO's strength is in being a formulator of policy. In fact the entire credibility of the ILO's future lies in its role to improve national capabilities in respect of concerns which inhibit development and consequently a fair deal for labour. Vocational skill development, creation of employment opportunities, productivity improvement and population education are these concerns and these are to be more directly addressed by the ILO.

Should international trade be used as a leverage for securing compliance with labour standards? India's position was clearly spelt out by Mr. Pranab Mukherjee, our Commerce Minister, at the GATT Ministerial Meeting in Marrakesh in April 1994, who said that there had been attempts to link social policy concerns, namely labour standards with trade policy. While there was a firm commitment to internationally recognized labour standards, there was no merit whatever in the attempt to force linkages where they do not exist. Trade policy could not be made the arbiter of all concerns: it should be confined to concerns it can address efficiently on the basis of generally shared perceptions and considerations. For the very same reason there was no need for a declaration of a programme of action or a new international Convention on this matter.

Trade-triggered compulsory equalization of costs in the name of labour standards could only result in the counterproductive and sad denial of the very opportunities for development expected to be opened up by freer world trade. The looming threat of trade sanctions to force labour standards would, in fact, significantly inhibit their ratification.

I have read with keen interest the March 1994 statement made by the Director-General to the European Parliament at the public hearing on the S cial Clause and International Trade. He said th
"As far as principles are concerned, applying san tions on the basis of conditions of employment social protection would amount to outside interf rence by imposing choices which run counter ILO's principles. I must insist that social progress in country can be promoted only through the decisio of those most directly affected."

The same thought had been presented very ca didly and forcefully by our Prime Minister Naras ima Rao while addressing the World Economic F rum at Davos in February 1994, who said that chang had to be accepted as the result of deliberate a objective thinking. At the same time, those w wore the shoe and knew where it pinched shou have full say in deciding how to mend it. In the ne found enthusiasm for change, governments shou not go overboard and plunge large chunks of the peoples into mass misery; they had no right to that. No-one had the right to throw millions people out of their jobs overnight because a parti ular change was proposed. Solutions which involve reforms, but which were also humane had to found. In India, it was called reform with a huma face. Each society had to find its own "middle way suited to its genius and circumstances; and th should be the approach of countries that accepte change. The voluntary acceptance of change was th crux of the matter everywhere you had reform com ing in any sphere of activity in human life. Read made prescriptions coming from thousands of mil away were no use. Everyone had to evolve their ow thinking, their own way of mending their shoe.

The Director-General has also emphasized th need to offer developing countries real and practic support to cope with the negative consequences introducing a higher level of labour protection. H has quoted examples of child labour in this contex

Mr. GOH (Minister of State for Labour, Sing pore) – On behalf of the Singapore delegation I wis to congratulate the President on his election to th presidency of the 81st Session of the Internationa Labour Conference. I am confident that under h able leadership and guidance this Conference w proceed smoothly to a successful conclusion.

The ILO is celebrating its 75th anniversary th year. The Singapore delegation would like to exten its best wishes to the ILO and warmest greetings all delegates attending this Conference. We wou also like to take this opportunity to commend the ILO for making significant progress in the promotion of social justice and development which has benefited workers worldwide.

Global economic conditions are expected to be better this year. The Asian Development Bank has forecast that the world economy will grow by 1.8 per cent this year, as compared to 0.6 per cent in 1993. However, growth will be unevenly distributed. The developing countries overall are expected to grow by 5 per cent as against the figure of 2 per cent for industrial countries or, according to the latest forecast, 2.6 per cent. In the case of Asian developing countries, their economies are projected to expand faster at 7.2 per cent.

The economic growth in Asia, particularly East Asia and South-East Asia, has been phenomenal and is becoming an important global economic locomotive. The rapid growth of the Asian NIEs and ASEAN, together with the newly emerging economies of China and India, have made the Asia Pacific area the most economically dynamic region in the world. Rapid economic growth in these countries has brought about employment creation and significant improvements in the economic and social conditions of their peoples. Many workers in this region are now enjoying rising income and better standards of living.

Most of the industrialized countries, on the other hand, have in past years been plagued by economic stagnation and recession and continue to face the serious problem of unemployment: 35 million people in the 25-nation OECD are unemployed. This has imposed severe economic and social strains on their societies. But what has gone wrong in the industrialized countries which not too long ago were regarded as the engine of growth in the global economy?

In a recent OECD report on work and employment, rigid labour laws and inflexible labour policies, in addition to other factors, were identified as important causes of the unemployment crisis in the industrialized countries. In the report it was pointed out that the labour policies of most industrialized countries, particularly those in Europe, had become more rigid although the times demanded flexibility. The report also attributed the crisis of the industrialized countries to their failure to make adequate adjustments to allow for technological advancement, changes in international trade and greater competition in the global environment. The report therefore called for the easing of labour laws to help promote economic growth and job creation. It recommended the reduction of minimum wage protection as well as employment security and unemployment benefits.

Instead of taking hard-headed, painful decisions to resolve the problem of declining competitiveness and chronic unemployment, governments in many industrialized countries are under increasing domestic pressure to adopt measures aimed at protecting their industries and jobs. The latest attempt to introduce social clauses in international trade agreements before the signing of the Final Act of GATT is seen by the developing countries as a disguised form of protectionism, aimed at eroding their comparative advantages and blunting their competitiveness.

If rigid labour laws and policies are indeed the causes of serious economic woes and unemployment crises in the industrialized countries, why should social causes based on such laws and policies be imposed on the developing countries? What is the real intention behind such a proposal? Beginning with basic workers' rights, it will soon lead to the imposition of other standards and practices based on the values and norms set by the western industrialized countries. What would the consequences be if the proposed trade and labour policies were adopted?

Firstly, the imposition of trade restrictions in the guise of non-compliance with labour standards would adversely affect the economies of the developing countries. It would take away jobs and inflict hardship on the people, rather than raise their standard of living. Consequently, this would greatly weaken their purchasing power with detrimental effects on their demands for goods and services from the developed countries. The end result would be a curtailment of global trade, jeopardizing economic growth and employment creation.

Secondly, the linkage of labour standards with trade would negate the efforts of GATT to promote free trade for the benefit of all. According to the GATT estimate, a more liberal trading regime following the Uruguay Round is expected to generate more than US$250 billion annually in the world economy by early next century. This means that more jobs would be created and many workers would be given the opportunity to be engaged in productive employment. However, such gains could only be realized through more liberal trade and not trade restriction.

The experience of East Asian and South-East Asian countries shows that it is through a more open economic policy and liberal global trade that faster economic growth, employment creation and improved standards living workers can be achieved.

ASEAN, which has greatly benefited from trade liberalization, is therefore concerned that ILO labour standards may be used as a vehicle of protectionism, for this would seriously negate efforts to achieve economic growth, greater employment opportunities and a better standard of living for workers. In this regard, the ASEAN Governments have decided to table at this Conference a resolution calling upon the ILO to resist the linking of social clauses to international trade.

No doubt the ILO is the appropriate forum to formulate labour standards and to discuss ways and means to help member countries to improve their labour standards. There are constructive measures which the ILO can adopt to help the developing countries achieve social progress and improve their labour standards. But it would be counter-productive to use the curtailment of trade as a means to attain such objectives.

The ILO should be aware that without economic growth and job creation its efforts to improve the economic and social conditions of workers would be greatly undermined. A more liberal trading system would stimulate economic growth and create more employment opportunities.

The United States' recent decision to delink trade and human rights for the renewal of MFN status for China is most instructive. It is a realization that trade restriction is not the best way to deal with the human rights issue. It would be a regressive step indeed if we were to consider any proposal to link trade to labour standards against the larger interest of trade liberalization, economic development and job creation.

The ASEAN resolution also calls upon the ILO to review those Conventions which are outdated, taking into account the social and economic conditions of the developing countries which now constitute the majority of its membership. In its review the ILO should take into consideration the diverse values, norms and needs of the developed and the developing countries, resulting from their different stages of development.

Further, in assessing whether a member State has complied with a ratified Convention, it is necessary for the ILO to consider the overall progress made by the member State in achieving its wider social and economic objectives. It should not adopt a purely legalistic approach in interpreting compliance with labour standards.

Also, instead of focusing solely on the technical compliance of ratified Conventions, the ILO should step up its efforts to help member States, particularly developing countries, to improve the social and economic status of their workers through education, training and skills upgrading. The developing countries require assistance, not punishment, in their pursuit for a better life for their people. Education, training and relevant technical assistance programmes would help to raise the skills level of workers, enhance their earning capacity and improve their social and economic well-being.

The world is now at a turning point. We have witnessed the end of the Cold War and ideological rivalry. A new wave of democratization is sweeping many parts of the world as seen in the recent developments in Asia, eastern Europe, the Middle East and South Africa. The global focus has now shifted to economic and social issues; countries are channelling their resources for economic and social developments to improve the lives of their people. We have also witnessed how market liberalization and increased global trade have transformed the Asian NIEs and ASEAN, and more recently countries such as China, from agriculture-based societies to vibrant, dynamic and growing economic entities. Indeed, the robust economic growth in these countries has brought about a significant improvement in the standards of living for their peoples.

With increasing interdependence among nations as a result of the globalization of the world economy, the free flow of capital, technology and skills, and a more liberal international trading environment, there are now favourable conditions for closer economic cooperation and social development. It would be a great loss if we failed to seize this opportunity to harness these favourable conditions to create a better world. Rather than allowing trade protectionism or friction to engender new tensions in international relations, countries should work together more closely to enhance the prospects for economic growth and social development for the benefit of all. In this regard, I believe that the ILO, the only tripartite international body with representation from governments, employers and workers, can play an important role to help foster greater international cooperation, promote economic growth, create more employment opportunities and improve the economic and social well-being of workers.

Original Russian: Mr. MELIKIAN (Minister of Labour, Russian Federation) – First of all may I have the honour to read to you a message from the President of the Government of the Russian Federation, Mr. V. Chernomyrdin, to the Director-General of the International Labour Office and to participants of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference:

"Mr. Director-General, Mr. President, participants and guests of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, I am delighted to congratulate you on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization. By its active work to defend the interests of workers and to ensure social justice on the basis of social partnership and by its activities against poverty, unemployment, discrimination and forced labour, the ILO has significantly contributed to the international community's efforts to establish a more just and lasting peace. The practical help given by the ILO to assist countries in settling complicated social and economic problems is of great importance.

"Russia is currently undergoing far-reaching economic transformations related to the introduction of the market economy. The objectives of these reforms are to conduct structural change, to increase production and to solve social problems. There are a number of major measures being taken to defend vulnerable groups of the population, to combat unemployment and to prevent a drop in the standard of living.

"The Accord on social agreements, which included the participation of all the major political parties, social movements, trade unions and religious organizations, as well as all branches of the Russian governmental authorities, is helping to obtain these objectives. For questions of social protection, active employment policies and social partnership, Russian relies heavily on the ILO's experience. We appreciate it and make use of it extensively in practice.

"On the occasion of this anniversary, I wish you, Sir, personal success in your work and significant progress in your noble work."

In our view, the part played by the ILO in establishing and defending basic human rights, in assisting in social and economic development, in developing rules and machinery based on social partnership for the social protection of people is exceedingly important and is acknowledged by all. More effective work in this direction is, we think, the principal task of the ILO at this time of universal change.

As regards the practical problems in improving our Organization, I should like to support the decisions of the Governing Body to improve the process of drawing up Conventions and Recommendations and the action to supervise the effect given to them. We also support the proposal made by the Director-General that a greater use be made of so-called "soft law", i.e. of codes, practical manuals and various didactic materials which could be used by member countries to solve the problems before them. The representatives of the Russian Federation advocated such an approach during the discussion on the programme and budget for the current two-year period. At the same time we think that further thought must be given to whether or not at this stage additional duties should be given to the ILO secretariat as regards mediation and arbitration in disputes on the application of Conventions and serious collective disputes, and in connection with the introduction of new procedures for the examination of complaints.

We are convinced that the influence of the ILO in developing social aspects of international economic policy should grow. In this connection we support consideration by the Conference of the employment problems and standards of living throughout the world and the convening of high-level talks about worldwide employment. These activities should be conducted in closer coordination with other international organizations, within the ILO's terms of reference and within the limits of the expenditure approved.

The authority of the ILO in the new context, with the end of the ideological and military conflict between East and West, depends above all on the ILO's ability to take effective action, to give effect to its terms of reference, to react quickly to changing circumstances in the world and to satisfy more fully the needs of member governments and the social partners. Russia has thus supported the policy of active partnership, which is designed to extend and make more effective use of ILO assistance to member countries, taking into account the priorities they have set for their social policy. In this sense, we welcomed the setting up of a multidisciplinary ILO group for the countries of Central and Eastern Europe. But we are somewhat disappointed and disturbed at the work done as regards consultation, the weight attached by the group to Russian priorities in the implementation of certain measures and as regards the nature of such action and the recommendations made.

In general, we are in favour of strengthening the mutual relationship with the ILO. Our Government's recent decision to pay an extra $15 million to the ILO budget in the near future testifies to this. In exchange, we hope that the ILO will take our interests fully into account, including those relating to organizational and staffing questions.

The experience of countries which have made the changeover from a centralized planned economy to a market one shows how painful and complex this process is. Bearing in mind that for over 70 years Russia and other countries of the former Soviet Union departed a very long way from a market economy and that today's changes come at a time when, in addition, many economic ties have been severed, the process is all the more difficult for us.

In Russia, this is the fifth year of industrial slump. Hidden unemployment is beginning to change into open unemployment, and it is becoming ever more acute. The extent to which we can give effect to social guarantees and provide social protection for our people is limited for lack of funds.

At the same time I would like to say that in the last few months the social and economic position of Russia has changed considerably. We are witnessing trends leading ever more clearly in different directions. Despite a continuing slump in production, there has been some light on the horizon. Inflation has dropped by a factor of 2.5 to 3. Markets are better stocked than before. Undertakings have encountered limits in demand which have led to changes in their policy. The balance of payments has improved.

There has been some compensation for the considerable drop in people's real living standards which had been allowed for during the initial stages of liberalization. This year, there has been a marked fall in the number of persons living in the family household below subsistence levels, and pay differentials are starting to even out. The Russian economy has reached a critical point in the slump and, provided social peace is preserved, we can hope to stabilize the economy and then move towards recovery.

To ensure social peace and hence create conditions for a healthy development of the country, we recently concluded an Accord on social agreements, which is mentioned in the message sent by our Prime Minister. This agreement was signed by most of the influential forces of political life, various social organizations and the majority of the trade unions.

With a view to intensifying reforms and stabilizing the economy, a host of presidential decrees was recently adopted, providing for the reform of the remaining State enterprises, the standardization of accounting procedures and the reinforcement of pay disciplines in the economy. There are proposals to amend the tax and fiscal systems, firstly by cutting taxes paid by enterprises and monitoring more closely that correct amounts are paid. Export quotas and licences are being abolished, except where Russia has international obligations. We shall continue to privatize State property, and amend the pay scheme.

In the near future, we will take a series of new decisions, including on the provision of social support for the poorer sections of society.

We are trying to develop the basic principles of the ILO: social partnership as a way to reach and implement effective social and economic decisions. At the same time we believe when the system of social partnership is in its infancy, employers' organizations are being established and the trade union movement is being radically transformed, the regulatory role of social partnership machinery should take due note of the stage of development.

Finally, on behalf of the Government delegation of Russia, may I once again congratulate the ILO and all of us on this anniversary and wish the ILO greater success in its activities in a changing world.

Original Spanish: Mr. GUZMAN MATTA (Employers' delegate, Chile) – On behalf of the Chilean Employers' delegation, I would like to extend to the President and all the delegates attending this meeting the warmest regards from all Chilean employers.

We hope that this session of the Conference, which opens today and coincides with the ILO's 75th anniversary, will provide an opportunity for a serene and deep series of reflections on the role and the responsibility of this institution with regard to the far-reaching economic, political and social development that mankind is going through at the moment, without neglecting the promotion of the high principles which led to its creation.

We are glad that the Director-General has included this in his annual report, and we hope that the observations made here will be considered in the conclusions of this assembly and applied to the practical activities incumbent upon this Organization in the near future.

Our main challenge today is to reconcile countries' legitimate expectations for higher standards of living with the unavoidable imperatives for economic efficiency required to achieve this goal.

In the quest for this goal, most countries are transforming their economic structures by the promotion of development based on free initiative and efficient market performance and adjusting to the increasing integration of the global economy. And the ILO must be an integral part of this effort.

If we are to overcome the extreme poverty afflicting most of the world, and achieve so-called social justice, we must guarantee a sustained production of wealth which spreads out to include all lower-income sectors throughout the world, by providing them with greater access to productive employment.

The alleged alternative between economic development and social progress is not real. In fact, they are the two sides of the same coin. The combination of economic growth based on a market economy, along with efficient distribution of social development resources to lower-income sectors, is the best means of effectively reducing poverty – as shown in several countries, including my own. Indeed, the steady application of a market system based on free personal initiative provides a real opportunity to finally overcome underdevelopment.

The right to work, as proposed in the Director-General's Report, will remain unheeded unless attempts are made to create productive employment and firms are provided with a stimulating environment to do so.

The ILO cannot therefore remain aloof to the widespread efforts of countries to strengthen their private enterprise as a major source of employment.

On this point, I should like to mention what the Director-General said at the Eighth African Regional Conference in Mauritius. He pointed out that during the 1990s and the following years private enterprise and the entrepreneurial spirit would play an increasingly important role in accelerating economic development, cutting unemployment and uneven income distribution among social groups and lowering the negative impact of structural adjustments.

However, the fact that such sound concepts are inexplicably missing from the report to this Conference by no means undermines their extreme importance; indeed, they offer an unprecedented variety of options for the Organization in the near future.

The ILO has undoubtedly made internal adjustments in recent years to cope better with the challenges of a changing social and labour world and they deserve our appreciation. However, merely accepting the new conditions of international economic relations is not sufficient; the Organization must assume the situation and take an active role in orienting labour relations in line with the new challenges of competitiveness, productivity and total quality, which are beginning to prevail in the world.

To this end, the creation of multidisciplinary technical teams deserves special attention, as an effective means of bringing the ILO's points of view, and the institutional support which is necessary, closer to the different circumstances of each country.

Rather than serving merely to propagate well-known concepts, we believe that these teams should be an instrument to analyze the employment and labour conditions of each country, to compile records on experiences that have proved positive in the labour or social security areas, and to take the necessary steps so that other countries might benefit from these experiences.

In a global economy, people's skills and the competitiveness of enterprises are what really matter; in terms of competitive advantage, they are more important than a country's natural resources or modern social and economic order.

The multidisciplinary teams must therefore actively promote vocational training and the modernization of enterprises and tap once again the enormous potential of technical cooperation that the ILO can provide – leaving aside the ideological prejudices which on some occasions have conditioned this cooperation in the past.

We are also concerned by the ILO's standards which have constituted the cornerstone of this Organization for most of its history. We feel that, at this stage in the modernization of the global economy, many of the existing instruments have lost their raison d'être and stand in the way of reforms needed to boost competitiveness in the world economy, since they are based on assumptions or doctrines which have failed or have been clearly outmoded by new and better alternatives.

In this respect, it is most important to bear in mind, as an unquestionable fact, that the State has lost its monopoly as the economy's driving force and the main source of employment.

In the same way, tripartism is no longer what it was; it must give way to a more direct relationship between employers and workers, increasingly restricting the State's participation so that it only represents public-welfare interests.

For these reasons, it is vital to examine thoroughly current instruments, to see whether they are compatible with a global, open economy and with new employment characteristics; and approval for new Conventions must be withheld, if they further intensify the divorce between the ILO's standards and the actual conditions of each country.

I believe that in the future standard-setting activity should be limited to the determination of basic and general principles of justice in labour relations; and that greater autonomy should be given to the legislations of each country, to enterprises and to the parties involved in the search for the best way to solve their specific problems.

Consequently, we do not feel it is fair that some developed countries wish to impose their own labour conditions and social security standards on developing countries, as these have produced high unemployment rates and would leave emerging countries unable to compete in the global trade market.

The above issue will become particularly relevant at the World Summit for Social Development to be held next year in Copenhagen, when several countries, on the basis of alleged "social dumping", will propose the introduction of so-called social clauses as conditions for the opening up of trade.

In view of the importance of such a meeting, where measures will be proposed to overcome the poverty of millions of people all over the world and stimulate job creation, we believe that the ILO is a competent institution to follow up the agreements reached at the Summit. However, we also think that it should take a clearly defined position against protectionism in all its forms, as the success of this difficult task will largely depend on the opening up and increase of global trade.

In view of the fact that development strategies applied by the countries are increasingly similar, investors' decisions to create wealth and offer new employment opportunities will be influenced by factors representing the cultural values or ethos of each country – these factors include: respect for traditions, public and private customs, a civic sense, the capacity to assimilate historical experience, the spirit of enterprise, the nature and efficiency of judicial and administrative institutions and the population's attitude towards work, education and art. I believe that the ILO can and should contribute to promoting change in several of these areas. We trust it will do so.

Original Spanish: Mr. CORTINA LEGARRETA (Employers' delegate, Mexico) – It is a very great honour for me to address this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference and I should like to congratulate the President, on behalf of the Mexican employers and on my own behalf, on his election to this important post, especially at this time of profound change throughout the world.

We are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, an occasion which without a doubt is a reason for rejoicing for the social partners and one which provides an incentive to redouble our efforts so that the International Labour Organization may not only enter fully into the twenty-first century, but so that this Conference may lay the foundations for it to continue to thrive for at least another 75 years.

The Director-General's Report entitled Defending values, promoting change is an inspiration and touches on some of the realities of the world today, the problems of the ILO, the aspirations of the various societies of the world, and finally offers ways of rejuvenating this great Organization. I hope this discussion will help us to achieve this end.

The Employers' group has in fact repeatedly raised the question of the need for change within the ILO and has also pointed out many of the problems linked to the globalization of the economy and structural change which are mentioned in the Report we are looking at today.

When we refer to the promotion of change, we must obviously refer to the positive evolution of the various elements which form a society. With this in mind there is no doubt that the values which have helped to create a society must be preserved so that on the basis of those values the process of development may lead to a better standard of living and hence a wider application of the values produced by each society.

Two levels of reality are necessary to understand the new capitalism in Mexico. First of all, the level of macro-economic policy which favours monetary control, free trade, privatization, environmental protection, democratization and fiscal balance. The second level of analysis is found in the importance given to business administration which emphasizes globalization, competitiveness, the winning of external markets, environmental management and technological change.

The new capitalism has led to this great consensus on the social macro- and micro-levels, but with one admirable quality – it has spread without partisan flags to both rich and less rich countries and to right-wing and former left-wing parties.

The liberalization and opening of markets has had such an effect on the new capitalism that more effective management is no longer only a goal of private, micro-social companies, now that administrative techniques have been revolutionalized to such an extent that they are applied in the public sector as an element of bureaucratic readaptation.

This type of development and administrative behaviour pressures governments towards competitiveness and efficiency, which quickly revolutionizes public administrations, especially in the assimilation of the philosophy of total quality.

For this reason we must understand how this great change has affected Mexico and in particular the various factors of production, the Government and the other strata of society. Obviously this analysis makes it necessary to know the pressures being exerted on Mexican society.

The fact that in our country we have a moderate rate of economic growth, low levels of inflation, increasing private investment, influx of capital, industrial rationalization and fiscal balance is not a long-term guarantee if we do not attend to social problems such as improving education and the environment, combatting extreme poverty and improving the quality of life of the population.

The main political pressure in the new capitalism is the need to closely examine the social and economic limits that are its principal shortcomings.

If we analyse the stabilization process and the efforts which have been made to reduce inflation, reorganize the State and consolidate healthy public finances, we come to the conclusion that the reform has been fast, necessary and expensive.

As businessmen we see the need to strengthen the macro-economic advances made in order to forge ahead in the micro-economic reform towards structured change at the reduction level.

Structural change at the production level implies a cultural revolution in all senses of the word, a generalized change in production and marketing, a shift in patterns of consumption and the rapid specialization of the economy.

In this sense, the concept of competitiveness will change substantially from a concept which comprised barriers to the entry of goods by factors such as productivity, cost and price, to a concept of competitiveness which will have a macro-economic dimension of a structural kind and a micro-economic dimension associated with the new productive culture.

Structural competitiveness is defined on the basis of a society's economic conditions, its political stability, its level of education, the availability of human and natural resources, the development of an efficient and diversified infrastructure, as well as stable macro-economic conditions.

Micro-economic competitiveness depends on quality, technological innovation, diversification of products, financial intelligence, care for the environment, dynamic productivity and aggressive links with new markets through strategic alliances.

We are on the threshold of a new economic, political and cultural era, an era which will mark the beginning of a new world order in which alliances will be the order of the day.

Capitalism as an economic system has undergone a revolution. The third technical scientific revolution is spreading rapidly and ideological disputes have yielded to profound reflections on solving the economic problems of a shrinking world, incapable of generating sufficient jobs for a growing population, in order to redistribute wealth in the light of huge social contrasts, to consolidate democracy as a political system and to allay development with social peace.

Each country tries to answer the questions generated by the economic development of capitalism in the context of the Cold War. How to promote greater employment? How to stimulate wealth, savings and the distribution of income? Will the State be able to yield to the claims asking it to limit its intervention and reduce its expenditure? How to generate or attract the capital necessary to eliminate defects in the infrastructure?

In the debate on new courses of development, we find important variables such as training of human resources care of the environment, technological innovation, promotion of investment, competitiveness, free trade, decentralization and deregulation.

These variables have a profound effect on the behaviour of the economic agents concerned, that is, at the macro-economic level, on the operation of undertakings, on economic policy decisions, on the definition of budgets, and on the strategic planning of undertakings.

What globalization has achieved is to reshape the economic world on the basis of more homogeneous laws and systems, but we cannot allow ourselves the luxury of causing frivolous changes in our cultures because of the homogenizing aspects of globalization.

When globalization promotes strategic alliances, and the forming of blocs as a natural repercussion of new economic forces, when geopolitical criteria predominate over local business needs, we come up against the limits of our own poverty, the economic inconsistency in our infrastructure, and above all the social and productive dualisms which we shall certainly have to overcome to achieve more just and equitable societies.

On the basis of what I have said, I would like to ask the Director-General to bear in mind all our concerns in the approach he outlines for the future so that the Mexican employers may see how the ILO adapts to the new needs of modern society.

Original Spanish: Ms. MORFIN MANSILLA (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Guatemala) – Mr. President, I should like to offer my congratulations on your election at this session of the Conference and I would also like to present my greetings to all workers represented by you in our Organization. I wish you and everyone in this august assembly all the best of success in the course of this session of the Conference.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate everyone here as we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. In the course of these years, a basis has been established for social and labour peace in our countries.

In my country, Guatemala, the relationship between workers and employers has undergone positive changes. After years of intolerance and confrontation, we have now reached an age of maturity where there is peaceful coexistence and a recognition of one another's rights and obligations conducive to reconciling the interests of capital and labour.

In Guatemala there have been protracted periods of violence and repression, which fortunately are now being overcome by a civilian society which has succeeded in halting abuses of power and in strengthening democracy.

In May of 1993 the President tried to suspend the Constitution and the institutions of the country and to interrupt the democratic process. This was a historic time in Guatemala. Trade unions, the working class and political groups – all of civilian society – united to block these plans.

The Constitutional Court intervened and cancelled the measures taken by the ex-president. Within the framework of the law, our society successfully elected President Ramiro de León Carpio, who was at the time an outstanding advocate of human rights.

The current Government has a profound respect for the law, and is committed to the rule of law and the consolidation of democratic institutions. It respects and guarantees human rights and the multiple cultures of Guatemalan society. It is endeavouring to improve the security of civilians and to fight against impunity and corruption. It is pushing forward decentralization and is promoting the direct and indirect participation of civilians in our society.

At the same time, it is striving to achieve peace by political means, by attempting to negotiate agreements with the insurgents and to fight poverty, providing for the most disadvantaged groups of our society: returnees, displaced persons, the disabled, the indigenous population, women and children.

Through its labour policy, the Government is doing all it can to improve working conditions, to promote the organization of labour and to protect employment and wages in a framework of macroeconomic stability and of negotiation so that we can find solutions to our employment problems by means of concertation between workers and employers.

Tripartite bodies are being strengthened with the establishment of high-level committees. A significant number of unions has been recognized in the past year and at the same time we have done away with unnecessary red tape. We have promoted mechanisms to achieve better monitoring of compliance with labour legislation, so as to ensure that the rights of workers are respected.

On the other hand, with respect to child workers – boys and girls whose families are poor and who have thus had to enter the labour market – we have given these children guidance and we have also provided guidance to their parents so that they are aware of their rights and do not neglect their education.

We also have special departments to promote the interests of handicapped workers and women workers.

We are promoting the dissemination of labour legislation in Mayan languages. If we are all equal before the law, and if the law applies to us all, then each and every one of us has the right to know what the content of the law is, without any discrimination.

We recognize our limitations in a country which is going through an economic, political and social crisis, but as the Government, we have accepted this challenge and we are doing all we can to accomplish these tasks so that our nation and history cannot call our efforts into question.

We hope that at the end of this period of transition in which fate has decided we should govern and determine the destiny of our nation, we will successfully establish a State based on the rule of law, conclude a firm and lasting peace and secure the commitment of all our society's citizens to establish a society on the basis of justice, equity and solidarity.

Finally, I would like to thank the ILO for its support to Guatemala in its guidance and skill programmes and for the impetus gained from international labour Conventions which have intensified and strengthened our institutions. I sincerely hope this task will continue to be fulfilled as much benefit for social and employment relations in my country.

Mr. PRIOR (Employers' delegate, Czech Republic) – Allow me start by congratulating the President on his election and, at the same time, by congratulating the ILO on its 75th anniversary – a long period of time marked by remarkable achievements. The principles on which the ILO was built have become the backbone of all market economies and have now been fully adopted by the Czech Republic where, as in other countries in Central Europe, a dynamic process of economic transformation is taking place. From a standard-setting viewpoint, the transition towards market economy has already defined new rules of the game whereas the second round of privatization, to be completed in the second half of this year, will shape definite features of the new economic environment.

This process has brought about a marked democratization of the whole society which is reflected, among other things, in a high degree of tripartite consultations and negotiations, based on the respective legislation. Social partners have gradually found their proper place in the social fabric and the role of employers and their organizations in the society has been reinforced.

It is necessary to mention that the Czech Government realized – already at the outset of the process of economic transformation – that it was essential to consult with the social partners on all economic and social measures and decisions; consequently a law was enacted concerning social partnership and collective bargaining. This law constituted the basis for the creation of a new body, the Council of Economic and Social Agreement, which continues to play a major role in the social development of the Czech Republic.

In our view, the role of tripartism cannot be reduced to being only an administrative tool; tripartism should become a comprehensive system which enables the social partners, by means of a constructive dialogue, to contribute new values to the development of society. However, it is important that this dialogue is restricted to those who have a role to play in the process. Attempts to bring in the so-called intermediary groups, representatives of which are concerned with and interested only in very narrow problem areas, are questionable; and implications of such arrangements can hardly be foreseen. Very probably, attempts might be made to apply political pressure and even to create "shadow parliaments".

We therefore believe that tripartite negotiations should be held among three partners only: the government, employers and workers.

There is a direct connection between the development of a market economy, market liberalization – and this should be understood as free trade without discrimination and restriction – and employment. Europe is troubled with economic problems and high unemployment. In these circumstances, economic cooperation is strongly influenced by attempts to divide Europe and to distinguish between the countries of the former Western Europe and the former communist bloc countries.

The euphoria that permeated Western Europe after the fall of communism has receded and has been gradually replaced by economic pragmatism, which has manifested itself by the creation of various trade barriers designed to restrict imports of those of our commodities where our comparative advantage has become apparent.

To attain desirable economic growth in the Czech Republic it is essential, in addition to basic systemic changes that have taken place, to ensure the development of extensive international cooperation among enterprises. Such cooperation should become part of the process of globalization of the world economy which, in my view, is not to be judged by the isolated negative impact of this process on the situation of citizens of a certain country; on the contrary, it represents a basic precondition for the creation of new jobs. Employment creation is the principal mechanism through which to achieve poverty reduction and social integration, and less-advanced countries should be assisted to achieve this goal.

In this connection, I would like to say that the criticism expressed by the Director-General in his Report, concerning the practices of multinational companies, does not fully apply in our country. On the contrary, I believe that capital resources invested by these companies can, to a substantial extent, favourably affect the economic transformation and structural adaptation of countries of Central and Eastern Europe. The fact that activities of these companies are closely watched by everybody in our group of countries does not allow room for any inappropriate behaviour.

The ILO can greatly influence conditions of employment in all member States by its standard-setting activities. However, the number of ratifications of many Conventions is very low. Should we not concentrate more on the application of existing standards and on revision of some of them, rather than on the adoption of new Conventions and Recommendations, in particular taking account of the situation in the developing countries?

In conclusion I would like to comment on one specific problem mentioned in the Director-General's Report, namely that of globalization and the introduction of the social clause. I must confess, I feel rather pessimistic about this approach. Indeed, does the ILO possess ways and means to be active and exert meaningful influence in this area? The cost of labour is one of the factors contributing to the competitive strength of the company. Very high levels of wages now existing in many countries of Western Europe should not be taken as a yardstick to measure standards existing in other countries. This is not only a problem of countries of Central and Eastern Europe which are now increasingly blamed for exercising "social dumping", this is a problem which primarily concerns all Third World countries.

The proposal advanced by the Director-General to introduce what could be called a "soft social clause" raises certain misgivings. The introduction of a system involving the ILO supervisory machinery could, indeed, contribute to weakening rather than strengthening international trade, and employers would not feel happy about that. The introduction of such a clause could lead to protectionist tendencies, and no way should be paved in this direction.

Problems encountered by many countries are narrowly connected with ILO activities. Many countries, including my own, will need assistance, and the ILO can provide useful services. The Director-General's Report could not deal with these preoccupations in detail, but I feel that more up-to-date information should be provided concerning the programmes implemented by the Turin Centre, and about the elaboration of new projects and specific ILO activities to promote economic and social development in member States.

The 75th anniversary of the ILO is not just a matter of celebration; I appreciate that attention is being focused on ways and means to respond to rapidly changing conditions and transformation, and to reaffirm the constitutional purpose of promoting social justice in the world. Experience tells us that sustainable development is based on stable macroeconomic policy management and on an institutional and policy environment, which encourages and allows enterprises to start up and prosper in the competitive market, thus contributing to the well-being of the nations all over the world. Is this not the wish of all of us attending this Conference?

Mr. SINGH (Employers' delegate, India) – I am honoured to extend the sincerest felicitations on behalf of my delegation and myself to the President on his election at this historic session of the Conference. I also extend my warm greetings and felicitations to the three Vice-Presidents. I am sure that under their guidance this historic session will meet the expectations of all the member States.

I am reminded of some of the landmark anniversaries of this Organization. The 25th anniversary saw the adoption of the historic Declaration of Philadelphia in 1944 which, while underlining the dynamic concept of social justice, clearly stated that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

Then came the 50th anniversary in 1969, the year in which the ILO was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for its outstanding work in the field of labour.

I wish to thank the Director-General of the ILO for choosing a subject which is not only extremely important but also raises many questions which require introspection and de novo examination of the role played by the ILO within the last 75 years, and what the ILO could do in the future. The Report of the Director-General provides enlightening and thought-provoking material to deliberate upon, and also seeks to provide a new direction to its activities. It is essential that the ILO should take into consideration the aspirations of the constituents in the changed context.

A new world order is emerging. We no longer have the Berlin wall. Everyone swears by the doctrine of the free market economy. However, some people definitely believe that the fall of communism is not on account of the bankruptcy of the doctrine, but really due to economic failure, and that the epitaph of communism is not yet written. The globalization of capitalism is being hailed as a triumph of the market economy. I am not sure whether it would be correct to take that view. No system is perfect and we need to examine the good and the bad that the new world order has to offer. In an atmosphere of survival of the fittest and increasing income disparities, suitable support systems have to be evolved in order to provide social justice and equal opportunities. I believe injustice anywhere is a threat to peace everywhere.

The agreement reached at Marrakesh on 15 April 1994 is a watershed in the history of the world economy. A pervasive multilateralism covering everything from apples to zinc is going to influence bilateralism, as also to an extent, the regional and subregional multilateralism like that of the European Community, the North American Trade Agreement (NAFTA) and the Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN). The proposed World Trade Organization (WTO), which is to become functional in the near future, is expected to have tremendous significance in the future order. During the first four decades or more of its functioning, the priorities of different States had affected the onward march of the United Nations towards its aims and objectives. Let us see how the priorities of the leading economies are going to influence the functioning of the WTO in a post-Uruguay Round free world trade order. And it is in the perspective of the speedy globalization of the economy along with growing competitiveness among the member States in the field of industry, trade and commerce that the question of social justice has to be dealt with by the ILO. The trade priorities of the different regional arrangements I have already mentioned (EC, NAFTA, ASEAN) may clash and the regional and multilateral trade adjustments may not always promote social and economic equality and justice. The ILO will have an onerous task on its hands in such a complicated scenario.

The cost of labour is one of the factors which has a bearing on global competitiveness. However, it is by no means the only one. While it may be natural for an individual country to quote general principles in order to promote its specific trade interest, an organization such as the ILO has to tread cautiously in this arena. It must be clearly recognized that attempts to standardize labour cost will mean conflict with the fundamental principles of the voluntary nature of member States' obligations. Also the concept of reciprocal rights of inspection in exchange for the renunciation of unilateral trade practices does not appear to mesh properly with the existing framework of the ILO's control and supervisory machinery. While human rights and basic values remain the bedrock of the functioning of the ILO and most member States are struggling to find solutions to the problems, the ILO should not be seen in the developing world as espousing only the cause of a few member States.

Let me again briefly refer to the recent agreement at Marrakesh and the discussions relating to the insertion of social clauses in an international trade agreement. Before I say anything on the subject, I wish to mention that our Government is a member of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and a signatory of the Marrakesh agreement. We are also fully committed to the ideals for which the International Labour Organization stands and for which it has a unique place within the United Nations system. We realize that the ILO Constitution states, among other things, that, "The failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries." Let me reassure you that we, the employers, the unions and the government, in our country are as much committed to the improvement of the quality of life of our people as anywhere else in the world. But, what concerns us is whether insistence on social clauses at this stage of development would amount to putting the cart before the horse. We need to understand carefully the unintended consequences of an improper sequencing of social and economic development. Social development is necessary. But it cannot take place without economic development. Any impediment to the economic development of developing countries would have the intended or unintentional additional consequence of impeding social development.

Here I must emphasize that the inter-regional inequalities in the world must be taken into account while formulating policies and standards. It would be a travesty of social justice if, to take an example, the income and institutional disparities between the rich Scandinavian region and the poor sub-Saharan region, between the affluent Western economies and the least developed countries are not taken into due account while formulating constructive developmental and regulatory interventions by the ILO. In fact, the poor regions need to be accorded special consideration.

The year 1994, when we are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia has a special significance for Indian industrial relations also. This year marks the 50th anniversary of tripartism in India which has acquired special significance in the context of structural reforms.

The Indian economic reforms are unique in pursuing the middle path blending the interests of industry and people and harmonizing the considerations of development with social justice. The quest for more and better jobs has become a global challenge. Yet, in order to compete, we have to rationalize the use of all our productive resources, including labour. In a country where unemployment and underemployment levels are already high, the very idea of a possible reduction in jobs in the organized sector may not be acceptable. Having done pioneering work in the field of job creation, the ILO should shift its focus to employability and productive employment creation. Further programmes could be taken up in orienting and preparing people for multi-skills and careers. Greater thrust may be given to technical cooperation through increased emphasis on education and training.

I am also reminded of the recently held meeting at the United Nations of the Preparatory Committee of the World Summit for Social Development to be held in Copenhagen early next year. This summit of heads of governments has three main objectives. These are: reducing poverty, increasing productive employment and enhancing social integration. All three objectives are pre-eminently relevant for all countries including industrialized countries which are also witnessing disturbing levels of unemployment and poverty. The globalization process appears to have made the interstate differences and inequalities more apparent and in many ways more unacceptable. This worrisome aspect of globalization has been specifically emphasized in the Report of the Director-General for this 81st Session.

Since concerted international action is essential for achieving social justice in a global economy, I hope that just as the 25th anniversary of the Organization was marked by the adoption of the Declaration of Philadelphia aimed at securing social justice in a post World War II economic order, this 75th anniversary will identify a shared set of values under the ILO's mandates for an effective programme in a globalizing post-cold-war economic order.

Let me conclude by saying to you, that we support the Director-General and the Conference in this epic crusade of "defending values, promoting change". Let the ILO make the best use of its unique position in the United Nations system as the torchbearer in influencing social and labour policies among the international community.

I am grateful for having been given this opportunity to share some of my thoughts with the distinguished delegates participating in the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. On behalf of the Employers from India, I reaffirm the faith in our national objectives of growth, stability and social justice and our commitment to evolving a common approach to accommodate the aspirations of every segment of the global village, for therein lies the key to lasting world peace and prosperity.

Mrs. BABIC (Government delegate, Croatia) – It is my special honour to greet in this anniversary year, on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Croatia, all the participants at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

The Government of the Republic of Croatia highly appreciates the importance of the membership of the Republic of Croatia in the ILO, which has a guaranteed place of honour among the most numerous and certainly most respected international organizations, due to its continuity in organization and functioning as well as its clearly designated goals based on eternal values.

Besides being an occasion on which we can recall the past, the significant anniversaries inspire us to think seriously about the future. This is indeed a time of changes and let this Conference, among other things, serve to bring forth a strategy for the further activities of the ILO and its readiness to respond to the demands created by the changes which have occurred – and which will continue to occur.

The Republic of Croatia, exposed to the imperialist aggression by Serbia and Montenegro – which has multiplied human suffering on this soil to an unthinkable degree, resulted in hundreds of thousands of refugees and displaced persons, the suffering of children, women and elderly, genocide and other crimes against the civil population and the destruction of economic resources – has the moral right to tell this Conference that the free and democratic world and its institutions were obliged, without hesitation, to respond energetically to this aggression which was directed against the general values of civilized society. The fundamental changes on the territory of the former Yugoslavia, which led the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Slovenia on the path of western European standards regarding human rights and freedoms, regarding political democracy, free market, equality and tolerance, were not supported immediately and unreservedly.

Was the reason for this hesitation by the international community the fear of national individualization and self-determination of small nations as obstacles to the processes of integration in the world and the globalization of economic and social development? We maintain that such fear was groundless because national individualization and self-determination is a right and not a privilege, because small nations have the knowledge, wishes and possibilities to contribute fully to the development of the international community.

I wish to assure you, on behalf of my Government, that the Republic of Croatia will, by its own social and economic development, through advocating a just peace and a peaceful solution to the conflict imposed on it and through the respect of human rights and freedoms, significantly contribute to the stability of the political, cultural and social order in southeastern Europe.

We are facing a period of preparations for the World Summit for Social Development which is to be held next year. My Government expresses its belief that this Conference will be a strong inducement to an efficient and active operation of the Summit, because these obligations correspond to the spirit and principles of the Declaration of Philadelphia, the anniversary of which we are now observing.

Let me briefly draw your attention to the efforts which my Government is making for balanced economic and social development in the Republic of Croatia.

The Government of the Republic of Croatia believes that the fields of work, employment and social security are of extreme importance for overall social development in the Republic of Croatia – a priority of national politics, which touches on basic human rights and freedoms and determines the direction of economic and social development as a whole.

The Government of the Republic of Croatia wishes to base economic and social reforms on the principles and standards of human labour, on active policies of the labour market and employment and a high level of social security and on a support programme of social welfare with financial and material assistance to specific parts of the population, to achieve an acceptable social price for transition and its balanced distribution.

The Government of the Republic of Croatia is rapidly working on the development of the respective legislation in the areas of labour and social security. Wide-ranging discussions are taking place – as are tripartite exchanges of opinions and consideration in parliamentary committees, and consultations with international institutions and experts; especially significant is the expert and technical assistance provided by the ILO.

The economic, social, legal and institutional infrastructure of the Republic of Croatia will be compatible with the system of the European Union and the member countries of the Council of Europe. Therefore, the Republic of Croatia rightfully expects that the way will be opened up for European integration.

Trusting that this Conference will not end without establishing clear recommendations to submit to the forthcoming World Summit for Social Development, the Government of the Republic of Croatia, maintaining that it has the full right to do so, will invite the World Summit: to confirm and strengthen the principles enshrined in international documents, declarations and multi-party international agreements on the right to economic, social and cultural development; to confirm and strengthen the principles contained in the Declaration of Philadelphia which state that all human beings are entitled, without discrimination on any basis, to material progress and intellectual development in freedom and dignity, in economic security and based on the principles of equal opportunity; to emphasize in particular the role, significance and contribution of the ILO on the issues of social development; to call upon United Nations member countries to cooperate closely with the ILO, to participate actively in the drawing up of ILO documents, to observe the spirit, principles and standards of the ILO in the fields of labour, employment, social security – especially through national legislation and practice – and to encourage the implementation of ILO Conventions and Recommendations, which determine principles of freedom of association, tripartite cooperation, the right to collective bargaining and the standards of protection at work, principles of equal opportunity and equality; to call upon highly developed countries for cooperation and assistance in the realization of the programmes of reconstruction of countries devastated by war, in particular, the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, especially for cooperation and assistance in the implementation of the programme for the return of refugees and displaced persons to their regions, for the reconstruction of settlements, economic facilities, social welfare structure, transport and communal infrastructure.

It is my sincere wish that the participants of the Conference will be successful in their work. Allow me to assure you, on behalf of my Government, that the Republic of Croatia will be an active and recognizable member of the international community by the efforts it will make and its contribution to economic and social development in the processes of integration and to multilateral and bilateral cooperation for the well-being of the international community as a whole.

Original Spanish: Mr. MORALES (Minister of Justice and Labour, Paraguay) – Firstly, I would like to congratulate the President and the Officers of the Conference on their election and wish them every success in conducting our work.

It is an honour and a great satisfaction to come to this rostrum at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, and to represent the Government of the Republic of Paraguay, presided over by Mr. Juan Carlos Wasmosy, Civil President, elected through a democratic and transparent election on 9 May 1993. We are convinced that this meeting will acquire greater importance since it coincides with the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, marking our Organization's very positive accumulation of experience and action in the defence of social rights. At the same time, it is a great challenge for an equally complicated future, a particular challenge on the threshhold of the twenty-first century, which invites us to reflect on new courses of action that may be better able to cope with new social realities.

I must first of all say that we agree with the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, when he raises the crucial questions of whether workers' rights should not be considered alongside the right to employment, since the acute problems of unemployment affect every country in the international community, and whether the ILO should concern itself not only with the protection of workers in employment but also find work for the person who has none.

Obviously, the global economy is a reality today and no country can find a solution to its social problems on its own and in isolation. We must be aware that interrelationships, an exchange of mutual experience and regional and subregional talks will be factors in helping us to secure social peace. The ILO bears a heavy responsibility in steering our ship in these new circumstances.

The generation of false hopes, the claims by workers organized in bellicose, intransigent organizations, employers' reluctance to solve problems by consensus, preferring further breaches of labour regulations, governments which depart from the basic principles of workers' protection and the regulation of social balances are realities which are still bringing memories of a confrontational past, in which the ILO was renowned for finding solutions for problems. Today we progress through dialogue, negotiations and agreements, providing never-ending sources for improved social relations.

The new Government of Paraguay took over on 15 August 1993 and right from the beginning designed its activities with the fullest respect for workers' freedoms, opened up the Ministry of Labour for contact with the workers' and employers' organizations, and was obsessively concerned with dialogue, negotiation and the reaching of agreements.

In this way, the Government has achieved unity of action among the three most significant workers' federations – the United Workers' Centre (CUT), the Paraguayan Confederation of Workers (CPT) and the National Confederation of Labour (CNT). By coming together these three will carry greater weight in negotiation. Within the same context, agreement was reached with the Federation of Production, Industry and Commerce (FEPRINCO), the Paraguayan Industrial Union (UIP) and the Rural Association of Paraguay (ARP), all of them employers' organizations, to achieve common action. This collective action was consolidated in January 1994 through the creation of a permanent working party in the Ministry of Labour in which, as an effective demonstration of dialogue and negotiation, a very important decision was taken concerning the definition of priority matters to be analysed and resolved within the context of labour problems in our country.

A permanent tripartite board in the labour sector of the transportation industry, established to reach agreements on objectives and to define goals, avoided a general strike. For the first time a tripartite committee for the supervision of labour standards was created. Also for the first time, workers, together with employers and the Government, formed a Board of Tariffs to fix the fares for urban and long-distance transport.

At the same time, the new administration has recovered the confidence of employers and workers. And, an increase in solutions for conflicts through dialogue and negotiation has consolidated the machinery set up and helped reach numerous important agreements. Nevertheless, we have to go on perfecting this machinery by better training in the techniques of negotiation and an effective adaptation to reality around us.

A few factors brought the conclusion that talk and agreement have obtained the confidence of the parties concerned. Between August 1992 and 17 May 1993, 74 tripartite agreements were signed. In the same period under the new Government, from August 1993 to 17 May 1994, 106 tripartite agreements were reached, which makes an increase of 32 tripartite agreements. As regards the solutions in the first period, 32 per cent of disputes were settled and 42 per cent of disputes were settled in the second period.

Since October 1993 a new Labour Code has been in force. The economic prospects of the country are looking up. The Government is optimistic with regard to the achievement of positive cooperation of employers and workers.

Monetary stability, controlled inflation (in May 1994 it was 0.5 per cent) and the increased reserves of the Central Bank suggested there would be definite advances in the consolidation of social peace.

I would mention one point, namely a product of our social and political history – a general strike, the first in 36 years, convened by the three trade union federations. Although the employers and workers do not agree with the use of pressure, the strike was respected. Unfortunately, there were a few outbreaks of violence which soiled the degree of solidarity obtained by the workers. After the strike was over, talks were resumed to solve the problems needing review by the sectors involved. The Government guaranteed the full freedom of the strikers and absolute freedom for the workers who carried on with their work. As a sign of its political will, the Ministry of Labour, by resolution 85/94, set up a special Commission to follow the strike, inviting the workers' federations to send representatives so that through joint management, the strike's compliance with the law could be monitored. Unfortunately, such management and its aims were not understood and the trade union sector did not participate.

The labour problems that we have to face is, first and foremost, to meet the acute need for employment. The number of people constantly entering the labour market is far greater than the number that can be provided with jobs. In this sense, there is a very difficult task facing the ILO and ministers of labour, since upholding the principles of the right to employment means we have to take alternative action, which will make it possible to cater for the ever increasing number of persons requiring jobs, by matching them to the jobs available on the labour market.

The challenge is a difficult one for the Government of Paraguay and the Government is aware of the limits imposed by the legal aspects to the problem and the real pressure of the situation. In this sense, apart from stimulating foreign capital or foreign investment, we will work jointly with the workers and employers to define a sincere policy of employment based on new realities in which competitivity is a powerful factor which obliges countries, enterprises and workers to rethink their strategies, to enable them to reflect more accurately the realities around us, and reach the goals we set.

The framework in which the political and social activities of the country is proceeding is bound up with a democratic society which is pluralist and participative, working in freedom and in social justice, and hence it is of vital importance that all sectors concerned should participate, especially employers and workers, so that the happiness of our people can be assured through dialogue, negotiation and agreement. The Government is stimulating and providing for the setting up of the machinery required to diminish conflict and to bring about settlement by consensus.

Finally, the Government of Paraguay expresses its faith in democracy and is convinced that in this effort it will have the collaboration of the workers and employers and the very special advice given by the ILO, and so looks forward to a bright future in which we will face up to the challenges before us.

Mr. WHANG (Employers' delegate, Republic of Korea) – On behalf of the Employers' delegation of the Republic of Korea, I take great pleasure in extending our sincere congratulations to Mr. Charles Gray on his election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that his leadership will make this convocation both highly successful and productive.

This year marks the 75th anniversary of the foundation of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. Thus, many feel that it is high time to discuss in earnest, through the Director-General's Report Defending values, promoting change, the new role the ILO should play in this evolving world.

For the past 75 years, the ILO has made strenuous efforts to protect the basic rights of workers and improve their working conditions. Since its founding, the ILO has played a significant role in creating a fundamental charter of human rights in the field of labour.

However, many member States have not yet ratified the Conventions to a satisfactory extent; moreover, quite a few countries that have endorsed Conventions are not applying them. For this reason, the following questions have been put to us, both from inside the ILO and from outside.

First, are the ILO's efforts to set international labour standards – its primary mandate – irrelevant or ineffective?

Second, since the questions raised about the setting of standards seem to derive from the ILO's principle of voluntary acceptance, is it time to take more compulsive measures?

Third, would it be more effective to link the so-called "social clauses" to international trading agreements?

We would be well advised to pay close attention to the point of view that leads to these questions being raised in the international forum. They generally seem to stem from somewhat unrealistic aspirations in the promotion of workers' rights, and they are often based on the conviction that the prevention of social dumping can smooth the path to a satisfactory environment for fair trade between nations. Such measures might, of course, constitute an approach to increasing the level of ratification of the ILO Conventions. Furthermore, we may be led to believe that such a course of action would be an effective way to increase the number of member States that apply international labour standards.

We should, however, pay more attention to the fact that many developing countries are suspicious of any linkage being made between the social clauses and trade; they feel that such a course is little mor than a barely disguised pretext for new forms of pro tectionism. There can be no denying that too man developing countries are still unable to meet the con ditions of adequate social development. Under thes circumstances, if imports of goods from developin countries are restricted solely because these coun tries have a low level of social progress which doe not meet the expectations of certain advanced na tions, this may endanger the livelihood and employ ment of workers in these developing countries. Thi would make the protection of workers' rights – th ultimate objective of the ILO – even more difficul Consequently, how can we refrain from worryin that these developing countries might then lose th war they are waging on poverty and unemployment the common enemies of humankind. Another prob lem we must face: any friction between nations re lated to the evaluation and recognition of the soci clauses is likely to bring about conflict and confron tation at an international level.

Certain businessmen in Korea, having duly consid ered a relatively high level of wages and other cond tions of work, now argue that they have everythin to gain and nothing to lose by such a course of a tion. Nevertheless, I believe that for the ILO to in pose a direct linkage between working standards an international trade might impede the fundament spirit of the Organization and would not prove a wi measure. Moreover, in the same context, an attem to enforce Conventions by transferring responsibili for sanctions to a secular arm outside the Organiz tion does not seem a reasonable alternative.

We do not need to be impatient or disappointe because the number of ILO Conventions that hav been ratified is rather low – even if this is contrary our expectations. The ILO must take care not to g ensnared in any short-sighted ideology affirming th need to continue setting new standards at the sam pace. The Conventions and Recommendations of th ILO have, even if their effects are somewhat slo contributed greatly to augmenting workers' righ and, as benchmarks, have exerted a definite influen on the labour policies in several countries which not have an adequate record of ratification. This h been pointed out by the Director-General in his R port. We should also keep in mind that many cou tries, including the Republic of Korea, looked up the ILO Conventions and Recommendations points of reference when passing or amending labo laws, even before they joined the ILO. Thus, n tional legislation and policy have often been broug into line with the requirements of ILO Conventio and Recommendations.

In this respect, it is incumbent on us to re-evalua the relevance of our legislative function, its effectiv ness and its suitability to today's world. We have find a method – slow though it may be to impleme in full – which can be applied by all countries matter their power and size, with their full acquie cence and good will, and not under the threat sanctions. Ratification and observance of ILO Co ventions and Recommendations depend on a n tion's fundamental policies, and the main problem this context is each country's level of economic d velopment. In an awareness of this reality, it wou seem best to search for an alternative based on pe suasion more than on coercion. Voluntary accep ance of international labour standards is a more re sonable approach, and may be expected to bring about better observance of them in the long term.

We have to recognize that promotion of workers' rights, based on ILO standards, cannot be achieved without economic development. Therefore it is incumbent on the ILO to help provide the leadership that will enable developing countries to become better equipped with the economic strength needed to improve their workers' rights and working conditions.

Mr. MARSHALL (Employers' delegate, New Zealand) – The President is taking the chair of the Conference in a year of considerable importance for the ILO – a year in which 75 years of activity are recognized and a year in which the ILO must make important decisions about its future. We wish him well in that task.

New Zealand has been an active Member of the ILO since its foundation. As a nation we have a history of leadership in the areas of human rights and welfare. Last year we celebrated 100 years of women's suffrage and can cite amongst our achievements access to universal education and health services second to none. This includes the great work of Sir Truby King in the provision of services to parents and their newborn children.

In the world of work we have developed traditions of the recognition of rights: the right to work, the right to be represented, the right of non-discrimination, the right to bargain and the right to seek justice.

It is with this background that we must today express our real concern at the position that we are now confronted with as regards our relationship with the ILO.

As the Director-General correctly points out in his Report, the world has changed, the advances in technology, and in particular information technology, have done two things. First they have broken down the artificial barriers of geographical and political boundaries and, second, they have moved towards developing levels of education and understanding that the world's peoples never before dreamt of.

The triumph of democracy has not been the triumph of an economic philosophy. The market has simply been a tool towards the triumph of the individual.

People as individuals, whether acting as part of an enterprise, a community or a nation, or acting as employees, employers, consumers or voters, demand new levels of choice and accept that with the right of choice come new responsibilities.

It is recognized that different countries are at different stages of development. This calls for very different attitudes and approaches from institutions such as the ILO. It calls for a new maturity which recognizes the maturity of the Organization's constituents and their cultural diversity.

The days in which institutions can both develop standards and prescribe the method of application of those standards are gone. There is no place for the colonial imposition of one set of standards which fails to recognize each individual country's particular circumstances.

The world and its people will accept the desirability, indeed the necessity, for the establishment of broad universal standards. They will not, I suggest, accept the right of international institutions to stipulate only one way to achieve those standards. This will require a fundamental reconsideration of some of the ILO's basic principles.

For example, should the freedom of association also encompass the freedom not to associate? I believe it must. This being the case, we must question why the right to collective bargaining should have any preference or positioning above the right of individuals who choose to bargain individually.

The right to representation is fundamental, but again, like all human rights, it is a right available to an individual. Individuals must be able to decide whether or not they wish to be represented and, if they do, it is their right to decide whether they wish to have their representative work for them alone or to join with others in a group representation.

The right to strike is another area requiring reconsideration in light of both the development of individual rights and responsibilities and the development of democracy.

When an individual, whether alone or as part of a voluntary collective, has agreed on employment conditions, that agreement must form an honourable bond between the individual and the employer. Both parties have the responsibility to honour that agreement for its term. Strike action or lockout should only take place when the responsibility and obligations of the agreement have expired.

In a democracy there is no place for strikes against a government's policy. The correct protest for employer, employee or indeed any other individual is the democratic process of election – the ballot box. It is no longer acceptable to suggest that workers or employers should be able to use each other as pawns in political activity.

With the breaking down of global barriers and the continuous development of technology, we have seen the dawning of the age of the consumer. This has seen the development of an increasingly competitive global economy.

In this environment nations are recognizing that they must themselves become competitive, removing artificial trade protections which, through their restriction of growth, are proving fatal to the maintenance and indeed the improvement of living standards.

National economies are rapidly changing from being centrally controlled to being largely deregulated, placing the onus on individual enterprises to respond to international competitive forces.

This calls for systems which are flexible and responsive to change – placing new importance on the enterprise relationships between employer and employees.

Such a change does not require the removal or the lowering of national standards. It simply calls for a different non-prescriptive approach. It requires employers and employees to identify with each other's needs and desires in working together for the same aim, the satisfaction of creating goods and services valued by others and being rewarded for doing so.

This is not achieved by compulsion, with rules laid down by a national document drawn up by self-appointed experts. It is ideally the result of cooperation between employers and employees in individual enterprises, recognizing their individual rights and responsibilities within a framework of broad national standards.

The same philosophy must be adopted by the ILO in its development of standards and its procedures for applying these standards, if it is to remain relevant.

In this respect it is necessary to consider another fundamental ILO foundation – the principle of tripartism. There is no question that in the development of policy, governments have a responsibility to consult with society at large. To fail to do this in a democratic setting is to commit political suicide. There is also no question that as part of that consultation, governments must take account of the views of both employers and employees through their most representative bodies.

Taking account of the developments in individual rights, however, it would be both naive and wrong to grant those employer and employee representative bodies rights in excess of those granted to others in society. Yes, my organization in New Zealand, the Employers' Federation, is the most representative body of employers in the country. We cannot, however, pretend to represent the views of all employers. Although we reserve the right to express our views to governments and to the public alike, we cannot assume rights of decision-making on behalf of all in conjunction with any other party, be it government or an employee organization.

Employee representative groupings are, I believe, in the same position.

This fact does not detract from the desirability of consultation with employer and worker organizations either at national or international level. It does, however, throw into question the concept of tripartite decision-making.

An ILO direct contacts mission is due to visit New Zealand later this year. It will find itself in the middle of considerable political debate and will, I am sure, receive plenty of advice, particularly from those seeking a return to quite inappropriate rigid centralist controls.

In his Report the Director-General raised the question of the relationship between labour standards and trade.

Despite the development of a competitive world economy, stimulated by the recent GATT outcome, it is ironic that consideration is now being given to imposed international standards in the areas of labour, environment and conservation in the context of international trade.

In addressing these issues we must not lose sight of the basic objective, that is the development of the living standards of all people through sustainable economic activity.

We must be careful not to simply replace old barriers to free international trade, such as the imposition of tariffs, with new ones as a means of providing continued protection from competitive pressures for the developed nations.

It would be very wrong, both from a moral standpoint and economically, to even consider the application of ILO principles or standards in the context of trade until they themselves have been substantially reviewed and reorientated to the new global environment. Indeed even if this were to be done, no direct link should be made between labour standards and trade.

It is our belief that the ILO, if it takes heed of the change taking place around it and reorganizes itself towards the provision of broad, non-prescriptive standards for the guidance of members, the provision of research and the provision of best practice support to its constituents, will have an important and very valuable continuing role to play. We would indeed be proud of such an organization.

Mr. PARK (Workers' delegate, Republic of Korea) – Allow me on behalf of all Korean workers to express my heartfelt congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to the chair of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, a memorable occasion marking the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. I am convinced that your unbounded experience, unparalleled knowledge and capable leadership will lead this Conference to the opening of a new chapter in the ILO's history anc will ensure that this is one of the most successfu conferences we have ever had.

To begin with, I would like to compliment the Director-General on his Report entitled Defending values, promoting change devoted to the ILO's future-oriented development in commemoration of its 75th anniversary.

When the International Labour Conference wa held in Washington, DC, in 1919, Korean worker were suffering under colonial imperialism. And wher the Declaration of Philadelphia was adopted in 1944 it remained an ideal far beyond the reach of Korear workers for the protection of their rights and interests. Even after the end of Second World War, Korean workers were the victims of cold war ideologica confrontation. Under such an international politica structure, Korean workers' long-time cherished wis of joining the family of the ILO was only realized i December 1991.

As mentioned in the part of the Director-General's Report entitled "A changing world", in th last few years there has been an enormous international political change signalling the end of a bipolar world. I believe that the Republic of Korea's entry into the ILO family was greatly facilitated by th disappearance of East-West confrontation and als by continuous action by Korean workers. My pleasure is redoubled by the fact that Korean worker are also able to celebrate the ILO's 75th anniversar and to participate in the activities of the ILO for th defence and promotion of the rights and interests o the workers of the world. However, it is regrettabl that despite the end of the Cold War its legacy remains in the Korean peninsula and the workers i the northern part of the peninsula are not yet part o the ILO family.

Since the governments of the world have begun t implement neo-liberal economic policies to adjust t the globalization of the economy and to promot greater international competition, privatization o various state industries and deregulation are prevai ing phenomena. Accordingly, there are worryin signs of retrenchment of social protection system Alongside this trend, as concrete and practical discussions and agreements proceed on the formatio of regional economic blocs and world trade libera ization, flows of capital between countries are muc freer and more active than ever before. Multinational enterprises seeking maximum profits are fre to move to any place and any country where production costs are low. Workers also move to places an countries providing them with better employmer opportunities, higher wages and favourable workin conditions.

Labour-related problems have become too complex for a single nation State to solve effectively. Under such changed circumstances, it is appropriate and timely for the ILO to take a new approach to the promotion of social justice and the maintenance of balance between the role of the State and the market. Today, when we look around at the situations that have developed in every corner of the world, we can see numerous challenges facing working people. The gap between industrialized countries and developing countries is continuously widening. Within countries, the phenomena of marginalization and social exclusion of less privileged people are spreading. The economy of the world today is highly reminiscent of the situation of the great recession in the early 1930s, with the problems of record high unemployment, low growth, employment instability due to structural adjustment, deteriorating social protection systems and increasing child labour. We are also confronted with the gloomy fact that one-fifth of the world's population lives in absolute poverty. It is, therefore, necessary for the ILO to take prompt measures in response to the real need for the realization of social justice and for progress towards the goal of workers' dignity, since new and chronic problems are appearing and will have to be tackled as global tasks. Global approaches are needed to stimulate international economic growth and promote employment policy, and in this respect the World Employment Programme of the ILO is very valid. To further facilitate this Programme, I think that tripartism, which encourages the participation of social partners in the process of policy planning, is important, particularly at the national level.

The Republic of Korea, as one of the newly industrialized countries in Asia, has consistently pursued an economic development policy and has achieved a considerable degree of economic development. However, in recent years, development in the social field has not kept pace with development of the national economy. In the latter half of the 1980s, the Republic of Korea has gone through a transitional period of democratization in which workers have played a significant role and the movement has contributed to an improvement of the system in terms of a much fairer distribution of shares in economic growth. The Korean employers' attitude to the just demands of workers has also undergone many positive changes, so that employers pay more attention to the establishment of in-house welfare facilities and have begun to refrain from resorting to unfair labour practices in a bid to forge sound industrial relations. In the meantime, workers are struggling to improve their economic and social status and work together for the improvement of productivity as a result of the development of community consciousness. There is a broad understanding that it is very important for workers, employers and the Government to cooperate for sustained national economic development, fair distribution and the enlargement of social protection schemes, which are likewise vital for democracy and social development. As pointed out in the Director-General's Report, tripartism, the unique principle underlying the composition of the ILO, is expected to play a much more valuable role in promoting the sustained development of democracy in the Republic of Korea. This year, like last year, Korean workers, employers and the Government sat together for discussions on labour-related issues and succeeded in reaching a social accord. In consequence, I think that the ILO's activity for the promotion of tripartism is essential for the development of democracy throughout the world and is a mechanism for the ratification and application of the ILO Conventions and Recommendations.

In the chapter of the Director-General's Report, entitled "Standards: A broader approach", the Director-General drew attention to the questioning of the relevance and effectiveness of Conventions and Recommendations and supervisory mechanisms and to comments on the need to review them. In doing so, he suggests that a "soft" law can be a prompt and effective measure to deal with new problems brought out by changes in international circumstances and technological progress. I am concerned that the Director-General's proposal for a "soft law" may adversely affect the existing Conventions and Recommendations. Furthermore, our discussion of the inclusion of a social clause in the new World Trade Organization should focus on ways of promoting workers' interests and protecting workers' rights by preventing social dumping through the strengthening of the international effectiveness of standard-setting in the globalization of the economy. But we must exercise due caution in the face of trade hegemony and maximization of national self-interest.

In conclusion, I wish this Conference success in generating new momentum so that all human beings living in the much closer and more interdependent world of today can enjoy peace and prosperity in a society based on full social justice.

Original German: Mr. NAGY (Workers' delegate, Hungary) – Allow me, on behalf of the Hungarian workers' organizations, to congratulate the President and the Officers of the Conference on their election and to wish them every success in their responsible work.

Hungarian trade unions studied the Director-General's Report with great interest. It is aimed at bringing different opinions and interests closer to one another, drawing up a framework for more efficient activity by the ILO and pointing out issues that are decisive for its future. We agree that the importance of tripartism must not diminish in the future either and that the ILO's core mandate given to the Organization in 1919 and 1944 is equally valid today.

Throughout the world we can see signs of crisis – and our region is not an exception. The burden of this crisis is primarily borne by the wage- and salary-earners. In many countries, workers' rights and trade union rights are often seriously violated. It is essential that the activities of the only universal organization built on a tripartite basis should become tangible in the everyday life of the 98 per cent of the world population "covered" by the ILO.

In spite of the radical changes in the world, the relationship between the employers and employees has not basically changed. Our experience shows that when the situation becomes more complex the need for reconciling interests does not diminish; and we feel that in this respect the knowledge and experience available through the ILO is most significant.

We believe that this is even more relevant in the light of the crisis in the Hungarian economy and the sharp social conflicts that have emerged; and we feel that following the parliamentary elections in May, the new Government, the trade unions and the employers must now start negotiations and reach a medium-term economic-social agreement. As we see it, all the social partners are now interested in reaching this agreement. Consequently, there is a good chance of reaching a comprehensive agreement; in fact, this would be a political agreement among the parties as to the possible solutions to the most acute economic and social problems; and it would also advocate ways of establishing economic stability and creating the conditions for economic growth.

Part of this agreement – in our view – could also include measures aimed at a possible improvement of incomes and the social position of wage-earners, pensioners and the unemployed; it should at least halt the further deterioration of the living conditions of the poorest. We also think it is important to include in the agreement guidelines as to how to bring different interests closer together, extend workers' and trade union rights, and improve conditions for trade union activity.

All these are extremely important from the point of view of the workers and the trade unions; it is equally important that in the light of the election results, the new Government may be expected to create the opportunities for such an agreement due to its composition and willingness for dialogue and agreement, which did not exist during the past four years.

The significance of all this is further enhanced by the fact that at a time of social transition and change in economic structures, it is especially important to recognize international standards and to learn about them and apply them – standards which govern and regulate fundamental workers' rights and labour relations.

We have often found that in the course of preparing or applying statutory provisions it is indispensable for trade unions to have access to the knowledge and experience accumulated by the ILO. Due to the fact that we lacked traditions and legal provisions have not yet taken root, workers' rights are often violated – and at times it is necessary even to fight for minimum rights. Consequently, conflicts arise between trade union organizations at enterprise level – and these are exploited by the employer. In general, we can say that the level of labour law services is decreasing and institutions ceasing to exist. We have also noted that the legal protection of trade union officers has deteriorated and the legal remedies have been curtailed. The complaint handed in by the Hungarian workers last autumn was the result of such abuses of rights.

We believe that the ILO should take the initiative in the new democracies – and therefore also in Hungary – and insist upon compliance with international standards and the respect of rights codified in the various countries. We believe that this is not only in the interest of individual organizations but of all workers in our region.

We consider the training programmes launched recently to be very important and believe that the Hungarian trade unions can acquire useful information from them. The transfer of knowledge is more efficient when the organizations of the countries involved take an active part in drawing up the programmes and technical cooperation. Naturally we do not think that this is a one-way process only. We are ready to make our knowledge and experience available to the ILO.

On behalf of the Hungarian trade unions I wish to express our thanks for the support we have received from the ILO's multidisciplinary team (MDT) in Budapest, which covers Central and Eastern Europe. We appreciate their expertise and professional advice, the opportunities for consultation and their objective analysis – which we feel are of specific help to the social partners – as a part of the active partnership policy of the ILO. We believe that it would be a good idea, on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO, to launch a worldwide campaign for a "world charter of workers' rights" as a complement to fundamental human rights.

The ILO must now see whether it can bring its spirit of tripartism to the World Summit for Social Development in 1995 and make those present aware of the importance of conciliating different interests. This will be a very important test for the ILO and be an indicator of its future.

Mr. SABRIU (Minister of Labour and Social Policy, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia) – It is an honour to be present here at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference and to address the Conference as a representative of the Republic of Macedonia. I would like to extend our greetings and best wishes for the successful work of the Conference.

On 28 May last year the Republic of Macedonia was admitted to the International Labour Organization. We were thus offered the opportunity to take part directly in all the activities of the International Labour Organization as a sovereign independent State.

The ILO has made a contribution to the creation of social justice and lasting peace by establishing norms of international law regarding the development of the right to employment and regarding legislation, as regulated by international Conventions and Recommendations on labour issues adopted at sessions of the Conference. The ILO has also contributed to solving labour and social policy problems worldwide and to improving the living and working conditions of working people.

The current problems in the field of labour, which are related to the daily life and work of citizens and working people, have always been a concern of the ILO and have been included in all its activities. Proof of this is the present session of the ILO, held in a year when the ILO is celebrating its 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. During this session, among other things, an important problem will be discussed which, to a greater or lesser extent, is present in every country: the problem of unemployment and employment. The problem of unemployment is much more striking in the developing countries and the countries in transition, among which we find our country.

During the past few years our political and economic systems underwent crucial changes. Macedonia was constituted as a sovereign independent democratic and social State. We are establishing and building a market economy based on different kinds of ownership, an economy which offers equal treatment and equal protection.

Our State started independently to arrange relations in the field of labour in accordance with the norms of international law set forth in the Conventions and Recommendations of the International Labour Organization – a law on labour relations and several other laws governing the labour system have been adopted. The procedure for the adoption of other laws and the signing of collective agreements is also under way and after they are adopted the entire system of labour relations will be completed.

The new legislation on labour strives to reflect the fundamental values of the Constitution and especially the economic, social and cultural rights as part of the basic freedoms and rights of man and citizens recognized by international law and established by the Constitution of our country.

Simultaneously the processes of privatization of social capital and transformation of enterprises are developing together with the processes of the organization of labour and capital in a market climate and pluralism of forms of property.

The introduction of these processes and changes also creates major changes in the economic structure of our country and they have a direct impact on the problems and situations in the field of unemployment and employment.

The drop in production, lack of investment, the increased number of bankruptcy proceedings and over-employment have an influence on the decline of demand for labour. The number of persons registered as seeking work is constantly increasing and consequently is aggravating the problems in this field. In December 1993 unemployment reached the level of 170,156 persons, of whom 78.9 per cent were seeking employment for the first time; 51.9 per cent were university-level educated people of whom 66 per cent are under the age of 30. If we consider the level of education of the unemployed, those with a secondary education number 26 per cent, then follow the qualified and unqualified workers at 18.8 per cent, and finally the semi-qualified and qualified workers.

The problem of unemployment in our country is even more serious due to the blockade imposed by our southern neighbour, Greece, and the measures taken against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, due to which the economy of the country is suffering great losses. They have a direct impact on the output and development of our economy, on the dynamics and processes of employment, as well as the financial and social stability of both the employed and unemployed.

The Republic of Macedonia, within the framework of its financial possibilities and the material possibilities of the economy, is making efforts and is providing the appropriate financial assistance and social security for unemployed persons by providing benefits established by the law. It is also assisting families in need and which find themselves in emergencies and require funds for their existence. This assistance is provided through the programme of protection of socially vulnerable persons.

All this is also reflected in the creation and provision of social justice and lasting peace as one of the basic aims and tasks of the International Labour Organization.

Our country and the other countries in transition have problems requiring relevant technical and financial assistance due to the above-mentioned situation in order to stabilize and develop the economy to create more favourable conditions for greater and speedier employment of unemployed persons for their financial and social security.

In this respect, we believe that the International Labour Organization could provide a relevant contribution through its forms and types of activity, for the purpose of creating, maintaining and promoting social justice and lasting peace as one of the basic aims of this Organization.

Credentials

Brief Report by Mr. J.L. Nkomo, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, on the Credentials of Delegates and Advisers to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, Geneva, 6 June 1994

The Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office has the honour to present the customary report prescribed by Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

The composition of each delegation and the method of appointment of delegates and advisers to the sessions of the International Labour Conference are governed by Article 3 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization.

In accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of this Article, it is for the governments to communicate to the International Labour Office the nominations made. The Conference examines these nominations and decides, in the case of dispute, whether delegates and advisers have been nominated in accordance with Article 3 of the Constitution.

The Conference exercises this power in accordance with the procedure laid down in Articles 5 and 26 of its Standing Orders.

In particular, paragraph 2 of Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides that "A brief report upon these credentials, drawn up by the Chairman of the Governing Body, shall, with the credentials, be open to inspection by the delegates on the day before the opening of the session of the Conference and shall be published as an appendix to the record of the first sitting".

The present report is submitted in compliance with this provision. The list given in the table below was closed on Monday, 6 June 1994 at 12.00 noon in order that it might be available for inspection by the members of the delegations that same day, that is, the day before the opening of the Conference.

In addition, the present report serves for fixing provisionally, in accordance with paragraph 1(2) of Article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the quorum necessary to give validity to the votes taken.

The table below, based on the files containing the names of the delegates and advisers and the credentials with which they have been provided or the official communications transmitted to the International Labour Office, shows the numerical composition of the Conference. It is to be noted in this regard that persons who have been nominated both as substitute delegates and as advisers, in the letters communicating the nominations, have been included among the advisers.

To date, 147 States have notified the names of the members of the delegations. It is to be noted that only 85 countries deposited the credentials of their delegations with the International Labour Office before 23 May 1994, that is within the 15-day deadline before the date fixed for the opening of the Conference, in compliance with paragraph 1 of Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

On the other hand, while the Conference and the Credentials Committee have already previously insisted on the obligation which Article 3 of the Constitution imposes on governments requiring them to send complete delegations to the Conference, four countries (the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cambodia, Haïti and Honduras) had only nominated Government delegates.

It should be noted, finally, that in the letters or telegrams communicating their nominations, a certain number of governments have not mentioned the employers' and workers' organizations which they have consulted and with which they have come to an agreement in appointing Employers' and Workers' delegates in accordance with paragraph 5 of Article 3 of the Constitution of the Organization or have not confirmed that they were paying the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers in accordance with paragraph 2(a) of Article 13 of the Constitution. In this regard, in order to ensure greater clarity in establishing the credentials, it would be advisable that governments use, for the nomination of delegates and advisers, the form enclosed with the letter of convocation and the Memorandum on the Conference which the Office addresses every year to member States.

Finally, I should like to urge delegates and advisers to register in person at the Information and Reception Desk, the quorum being calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered.

Composition of the Conference, and Quorum

At present 291 Government delegates, 143 Employers' delegates and 143 Workers' delegates – a total of 577 delegates – are accredited to the Conference.

There are, in addition, 672 Government advisers, 366 Employers' advisers and 458 Workers' advisers – a total of 1,496 advisers.

The total number of delegates and advisers who have been nominated in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the Organization to take part in the work of the Conference is 2,073.

Since 14 of the States[1] now represented are in arrears in the payment of their contributions to the Organization, those Members, under the terms of paragraph 4 of Article 13 of the Constitution, may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or any of its committees. Account is therefore not taken of 51 delegates in calculating the quorum.

In conformity with Article 17 of the Constitution of the Organization and with Article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the necessary quorum to give a vote validity will provisionally be 263.

Observers

On the invitation of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, Bermuda, the Holy See and the Virgin Islands have appointed observer delegations to the Conference.

Organizations and Liberation Movements Invited

The Conference is also being attended by:

- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs, invited by virtue of Article II, paragraph 1 – relating to reciprocal representation – of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organization, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;
- representatives of specialized agencies and other official international organizations, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(b) of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of non-governmental international organizations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j) of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organizations also invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j) of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of a liberation movement invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(k) of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

Geneva, 6 June 1994.

[1] The Czech Republic and Slovakia. The 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference adopted a scale of assessments for ILO member States for the 1994 year which included the Czech Republic and Slovakia at provisional rates of assessment of 0.37 per cent and 0.18 per cent respectively. The setting of provisional rates of assessment resulted, firstly, from the fact that both new member States were members of the United Nations but definitive rates of assessment in the UN would not be known until late in 1993 and, secondly, that it was not considered reasonable to place an additional financial burden on other member States in the ILO by the exclusion of these two new member States from the 1994 scale of assessments. Accordingly, provisional rates of assessment were adopted based upon the rate of assessment of the former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic (Czechoslovakia) of 0.55 per cent in the original 1992-94 United Nations scale of assessments approved by the General Assembly in December 1991, divided by two-thirds for the Czech Republic and one-third for Slovakia, these being the proportions at which the two member States had undertaken to make provisional payments against their eventual 1993 assessed contributions as explained below. A credit due to the former Czechoslovakia in respect of the Incentive Scheme for 1992 of 2,109 Swiss francs was provisionally credited to the Czech Republic and Slovakia in the same proportions of two-thirds and one-third respectively. The General Assembly of the United Nations in December 1993 approved rates of assessment in the United Nations for 1994 for the Czech Republic and Slovakia of 0.42 per cent and 0.13 per cent respectively. The Governing Body is proposing to the current (81st) session of the International Labour Conference that, in accordance with the usual practice of harmonizing rates of assessment of ILO member States with those of the United Nations, the definitive rates of assessment of the Czech Republic and Slovakia in the ILO for the 1994 year be the same, and also that the credit due to the former Czechoslovakia of 2,109 Swiss francs be allocated to the Czech Republic and Slovakia as credits against their assessments for 1994 proportionate to their respective rates of assessment for 1994. Under this proposal the resulting assessments, credits and net amounts to be paid, compared with the provisional assessments approved by the 80th (June 1993) Session of the Conference, would be as follows:

	Swiss francs
	Amount assessed	(Credits)	Net amount to be paid
Proposed Definitive Assessment for the 1994 year

Slovakia
At the rate of assessment of 0.18 per cent of the 1994 income budget of the ILO of 338,219,750 Swiss francs	608 796
Minus 1/3rd of 2,109 Swiss francs		(703)	608 093
	1 860 209	(2 109)	1 858 100

The Czech Republic and Slovakia, which together had constituted the former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic (Czechoslovakia), which ceased to exist on 31 December 1992, became Members of the ILO on 5 February 1993 and 22 January 1993 respectively. They had both joined the United Nations (UN) on 19 January 1993, and were therefore not included in the revised 1992-94 UN scale of assessments which was adopted by the UN General Assembly in December 1992. Further, their rates of assessment in the UN would not be established by the General Assembly until December 1993, too late for submission to the 80th (June 1993) Session of the Conference. Accordingly, following the established principle of harmonizing the rates of assessment of ILO Members with their rates of assessment in the United Nations, the 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference decided that consideration of the rates of assessment for the periods of membership in the ILO in 1993 of these two new member States be deferred to the 81st (June 1994) Session of the Conference. Czechoslovakia's assessed contribution for 1993, which had been approved by the 79th (June 1992) Session of the Conference, amounted to 1,697,813 Swiss francs. After the deduction of credits totalling 267,332 Swiss francs in respect of the refund of part of the Working Capital Fund, the incentive scheme, previous cash surpluses and the 1990-91 net premium, the net amount payable by Czechoslovakia was 1,430,481 Swiss francs. As Czechoslovakia ceased to exist on 31 December 1992 the obligation to pay the amount due for 1993 was extinguished. However, in recognition of the financial difficulties that could be caused if they were to delay payment of their 1993 contributions until after they were determined by the 1994 Conference, the Czech Republic and Slovakia undertook to make provisional payments towards their 1993 contributions, the amounts being calculated by reference to the 1993 contribution assessed on the former Czechoslovakia for 1993, on the understanding that appropriate adjustments would be made when the definitive amounts due from each Republic in respect of 1993 were established. The Czech Republic undertook to pay a provisional amount of two-thirds of the amount assessed on the former Czechoslovakia for 1993 minus two-thirds of the total credits that were due to the former Czechoslovakia. Slovakia undertook to pay a provisional amount of one-third of the amount assessed on the former Czechoslovakia for 1993 minus one-third of the total credits that were due to the former Czechoslovakia. In summary, the provisional payments that the Czech Republic and Slovakia undertook to make in respect of 1993 were made up as follows:

	Swiss francs
	Amount assessed	(Credits)	Net amount to be paid
The Czech Republic
Two-thirds of 1,697,813 Swiss francs	1 131 875
Minus two-thirds of 267,332 Swiss francs		(178 221)	953 654
Slovakia
One-third of 1,697,813 Swiss francs	565 938
Minus one-third of 267,332 Swiss francs		(89 111)	476 827

During 1993 the Czech Republic paid 874,183 Swiss francs of the amount it undertook to pay and Slovakia paid in full the amount it undertook to pay. As explained above the General Assembly of the United Nations in December 1993 approved rates of assessment for 1994 of the Czech Republic and Slovakia of 0.42 per cent and 0.13 per cent respectively, and decided also that these rates of assessment should be applied in respect of their periods of membership in the UN in 1993. In accordance with the established principle of harmonizing ILO rates of assessment with those of the UN, the Governing Body is proposing to the current (81st) session of the International Labour Conference that it approve these rates of assessment for the periods of membership of the Czech Republic and Slovakia in the ILO in 1993, and also that the total credits that were due to the former Czechoslovakia be allocated to the Czech Republic and Slovakia as credits against their assessments for the periods of their membership in 1993 proportionate to their respective rates of assessment for 1993. Under these proposals the resulting assessments, credits and net amounts to be paid for the periods of membership of the Czech Republic and Slovakia during 1993 would be as follows:

	Swiss francs
	Amount assessed	(Credits)	Net amount to be paid
Czech Republic
At the rate of assessment of 0.42 per cent of the 1993 income budget of the ILO of 314,409,750 Swiss francs for a period of membership of 330 days out of a full year of 365 days the contribution payable is	1 193 896
Minus 42/55ths of 267,332 Swiss francs		(204 144)	989 752
Slovakia
At the rate of assessment of 0.13 per cent of the 1993 income budget of the ILO of 314,409,750 Swiss francs for a period of membership of 344 days out of a full year of 365 days the contribution payable is	385 217
Minus 13/55ths of 267,332 Swiss francs		(63 188)	322 029

Accordingly, the resulting position of the Czech Republic and Slovakia as at 1 January 1994 in respect of their 1993 contributions would be as follows:

	Swiss francs
Czech Republic
Net amount to be paid	989 752
Less – amount paid in 1993	874 183
Amount due as at 1 January 1994	115 569
Slovakia
Net amount to be paid	322 029
Less – amount paid in 1993	476 827
Credit balance as at 1 January 1994	154 798

[2] Yugoslavia. The 80th (1993) Session of the International Labour Conference approved a rate of assessment for Yugoslavia for 1994 of 0.16 per cent. The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, which was previously covered by the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, joined the ILO on 28 May 1993. In December 1993 the United Nations General Assembly established a rate of assessment for the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia in the United Nations for 1994 and for the period of its membership in 1993 of 0.02 per cent. In accordance with the normal practice of basing the rates of assessment of ILO member States on those of the UN the 259th (March 1994) Session of the Governing Body has proposed to the current (81st) session of the Conference that it approve the same rate of assessment for the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia in the ILO for 1994 and that this rate of assessment be deducted from that of Yugoslavia for 1994 of 0.16 per cent, which would reduce the 1994 assessment of Yugoslavia to 0.14 per cent, representing 473,508 Swiss francs. It has also proposed that the contribution of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia for the period of its membership in 1993 be based upon the same annual rate of assessment and that the resulting assessment, which would amount to 37,557 Swiss francs, be deducted from the 1993 assessment of Yugoslavia. This would reduce the arrears of contributions of Yugoslavia from 4,251,613 Swiss francs to 4,214,056 Swiss francs.

[3] Albania. These figures reflect a provisional measure taken in response to a proposal by Albania that it settle the amount due in respect of its previous membership of the ILO over a period of 12 years which is being submitted to the current (81st) session of the International Labour Conference for approval.

[4] Paraguay. The International Labour Conference at its 78th (1991) Session approved an arrangement for the settlement by Paraguay of its arrears of contributions accumulated to the end of 1990 and decided that Paraguay should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Paraguay has complied with the terms of its arrangement and has the right to vote. Paraguay also owes 245,066 Swiss francs in respect of contributions to the ILO and other League of Nations organizations for the period prior to 1939. The Conference at its 45th (1961) Session decided that these arrears should be cancelled, such cancellation to become effective on the payment by Paraguay of all its arrears of contributions due since 5 September 1956, the date when Paraguay rejoined the Organization.

[5] Poland. The 75th (1988) Session of the International Labour Conference approved an arrangement for the settlement by Poland of its arrears of contributions accumulated to the end of 1987 and decided that Poland should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Poland has complied with the terms of its arrangement and has the right to vote.

[6] Romania. The International Labour Conference at its 77th (1990) Session approved an arrangement for the settlement by Romania of its arrears of contributions accumulated to the end of 1989 and decided that Romania should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Romania has complied with the terms of the arrangement and has the right to vote.

[7] Chad. The 69th (1983) Session of the International Labour Conference approved an arrangement for the settlement by Chad of its arrears of contributions accumulated to the end of 1982 and also decided that Chad should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Chad failed to comply with the terms of the arrangement in 1993, and lost the right to vote on 1 January 1994.

[8] Viet Nam. This figure results from the application of a provisional agreement under which Viet Nam would settle the amount due in respect of its previous membership of the ILO over a period of 15 years which is being submitted to the current (81st) session of the International Labour Conference for approval.

Fourth sitting

Wednesday, 8 June 1994, 10.15 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Gray, Mr. Ould Sidi

FIRST REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda this morning is the first report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Ilabaca Orphanopoulos, Government adviser, Chile, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the Committee's report, which appears in Provisional Record No. 3.

Original Spanish: Mr. ILABACA ORPHANOPOULOS (Government adviser, Chile; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour of submitting to the Conference the first report of the Selection Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 3.

This report deals first of all with the election of the Officers of the Committee.

As regards the discussion of the Reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body, as you know yesterday we started with this discussion and the decision was taken that the speakers' list would be closed on Wednesday, 15 June at 12 noon, under the usual conditions.

Then the Committee endorsed a plan of work for the Conference committees which, although it is not binding, will enable them to organize their work in order to take maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. This plan is appended as Appendix II to the report.

As regards electronic voting at the Conference, Appendix I contains an explanation in written form of the electronic voting system which we will use again this year. The Selection Committee invites the Conference, in this particular case, to note that unless Officers of the Conference otherwise decide for a given question or a given sitting, the different methods of voting set out in article 19 of the Standing Orders shall be implemented in the plenary by means of the electronic voting system.

I would also like to draw attention of the members of the Conference to the proposal contained in the report as regards the quorum and punctuality, all of which is essential to guarantee the smooth functioning of this Conference.

As regards participation in the Conference committees, and those who have asked for the right to speak, the Selection Committee recommends that the Conference should continue the practice followed in the last few years as regards the number of regular Government members entitled to vote. Those who do not have the right to vote will not be allowed to vote.

The Selection Committee also proposes to the Conference that if this practice is not fully respected, then the calculation of weighting coefficients for votes in the committees should be based on the number of regular Government members present with a right to vote. The system of electronic voting takes into consideration this practice.

The Selection Committee suggests that the Conference authorize the Secretary-General to invite the People's Republic of Korea, a non-member State, to be represented at the 81st Session, in accordance with article 2, paragraph 3, of the Conference Standing Orders.

Another recommendation is made whereby the Committee suggests that certain non-governmental international organizations should be invited to take part in some committee meetings.

On the basis of the proposals made by the Director-General to the Governing Body, the Selection Committee has decided that there should be a special sitting of the Conference to consider the Appendix to his Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. This decision is taken on the understanding that at this sitting the comments will be limited to this Appendix and that the matter will not be discussed outside the framework of that particular sitting. The special sitting will be held on Thursday afternoon, 16 June. The Selection Committee recommends to the Conference, as regards the discussion of the Appendix to the Director-General's Report, that we should not discuss that subject at any other time. The speakers who take the floor will find that it is necessary to have a fixed speaking time. The list of speakers for the special sitting will be closed on Tuesday, 14 June at 4 p.m., in order that the President may submit proposals for a time limit for interventions for that special sitting. The Selection Committee has decided that the Director-General could allow some time for the discussion of this Report in relation to the time which may remain during the general discussion. It has also been decided that the committees dealing with financial matters, resolutions, etc. would not meet at the same time as the special sitting.

The Selection Committee has submitted various proposals with regard to designation of members of the Credentials Committee, and other proposals concerning the composition of the Drafting Committee.

Finally, the Officers of the Committee recommend that the Conference accept the list relating to the composition of the committees which is found in Appendix III.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT – Thank you. If there are no objections I shall take it that this report as well as the lists indicating the compositions of the committees appended to it are adopted.

COMPOSITION OF THE GOVERNING BODY OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference who has an announcement to make.

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The Government Electoral College of the Conference has confirmed the designation of the Government of Philippines as a regular member of the Governing Body, as well as the designation of the Government of Indonesia as deputy member of the Governing Body.

The PRESIDENT – We will now continue our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. SHEHI (Government delegate, Albania) – I am particularly pleased that on the 75th anniversary of the ILO I have been given the opportunity to describe the efforts that our Government is making to cope with the numerous problems arising during this phase of our development and to let you know of our attempts to find solutions for them.

These problems differ from those in many other developed countries and yet there are similarities, particularly with the problems being encountered by countries in transition.

Soon after the democratic process began, Albania courageously introduced five important reforms: political, economic, juridical, administrative and social. These are five important bridges to connect the Albanian island with the European continent.

It is worth mentioning that in contrast to the ILO, which on this anniversary is among the oldest of international bodies, the Ministry of Labour, Emigration and Social Protection is among the youngest ones, with a two-year operational history.

Under the centralized economy, this Ministry, the Ministry of Justice and other institutions were considered worthless, whereas for us democracy will always be based on the voluntary work of the people, and labour is considered as a dynamic force moving Albanians towards a market economy and social emancipation.

I am often asked about the employment situation in Albania and in reply I emphasize that there are lots of employment possibilities and that the employment structure is changing for the better. This does not by any means imply that unemployment is not a problem. On the contrary, it is one of the most urgent problems in our society. Unemployment varies widely between the different regions of the country, depending on inherited economic conditions and geographical location in relation to foreign markets.

Remote regions, artificially populated through the construction of arms combines, metallurgical combines etc., constitute a serious problem.

Understandably, we have inherited a multiplicity of problems such as those of ownership, investment and efficiency and also social problems arising during the solution of the latter.

In this context, the Ministry of Labour, Emigration and Social Protection assumes political leadership and responsibility for labour and employment services, labour inspectorate, social services and wage policies, social protection and protection for poor families, and social welfare for individuals with disabilities.

With a view to fulfilling these responsibilities, the Ministry of Labour, Emigration and Social Protection in Albania has established administrative machinery at the central and local level. New legislation is being drafted in the fields of labour relationships, social insurance and social protection for poor families and individuals with disabilities. The Albanian Government has for the first time created a budget for social affairs.

A major shortcoming is the fact that the labour market inherited from the past was unable to provide for mobility of the labour force from one branch of industry and the economy to another.

We are therefore making efforts to establish an effective training system which should also respond to the demands and strategies for the development of small– and medium-scale enterprises. In the light of these demands and strategies, a new system of vocational training separate from vocational education is being established in Albania.

The Government is giving priority to the promotion of favourable conditions for the development of medium- and small-scale enterprises taking more fully into account the population structure, the mentality and the geographica conditions of the country.

Although economic reform in Albania has been difficult, we have made a careful study of the process of implementation so that people under pressure from its consequences may be treated through social safety nets such as unemployment benefits, economic assistance and various social insurance systems.

Given the urgency of these measures, we have created a system of unemployment services throughout Albania to ensure that those who have lost their jobs as a result of the implementation of economic reform receive unemployment benefits. This is a very brief description of progress in the labour market institutionalization process and I would like to emphasize that the majority of these achievements have been realized through cooperation with the ILO. Our institutional reform was actually built up around the programme "Assistance to the Ministry of Labour Emigration and Social Protection", which was established by the ILO and is being executed by this Organization.

This programme, involving the creation of unemployment and employment services at the centra and local level, is of particular importance for our Ministry. Under the programme we are setting up important institutions such as a labour inspection system with strong legislative support. The design of a labour code is another important component of the programme.

Many international organizations have expressed appreciation of the progress that Albania has already made in economic reform.

I should like to stress not only the moral assistance provided by these bodies but also their practical assistance, for example the programme on wage policy development designed by the ILO, which perfectly coincides with the reform that our government is carrying out in that field.

I also take this opportunity to thank you for the assistance you are giving in setting up the Management and Training Institute in Albania, which is a valuable project at a time when our entrepreneurs, trade unions and public administration are keen to raise the level of their activity.

With a view to improving conditions in the labour market, we have invested considerable effort in creating proper training facilities for employees so as to enhance occupational mobility.

I therefore greatly appreciate the implementation of the ILO's programme for the establishment of a vocational Training Centre in Albania.

As a result of this cooperation, which I consider highly productive, we are participating for the first time with the third party represented by the Business Confederation. Taking advantage of this opportunity, I would like to thank you on their behalf for your readiness to assist them in this first stage of their activity.

In conclusion, I wish to express my warmest gratitude for the ILO's willingness to assist the country I represent, and I also thank all the other countries whose support has ensured the success of these efforts.

Original Burmese: Mr. THAUNG (Minister for Labour, Myanmar) – It is indeed an honour and pleasure for me to be present here at this opportune and quite unique time. This 81st Session of the International Labour Conference is truly an auspicious occasion, coinciding as it does with such important events as the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

On behalf of the Myanmar delegation and myself, I should like to express heartfelt congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to guide this august assembly. We are fully confident that, with a basis of experience and farsightedness, this Conference will come to a successful conclusion, bearing fruitful and meaningful results for the betterment of the working people of the world. Furthermore, we are hopeful that, under your able leadership and guidance, we will arrive at positive results in devising new approaches to keep the Organization in harmony with the changing world order.

At this juncture, allow me to commend the report of the Governing Body and the Report of the Director-General. Allow me also to join with the other speakers before me in expressing our appreciation of the foresight and vision of the Director-General in presenting timely proposals for consideration of appropriate future programmes of action. His objective assessment of the existing activities and programmes of the Organization and his valuable suggestions for the adjustment needed to meet the changing world order, are much to be praised. Moreover, we should like to express our support for his call to the international community to reaffirm its belief in social justice as a fundamental value, and his determination to further its cause. We laud his confidence in active tripartism as a motivating force, and its determination to adapt the Organization and its secretariat to the tasks that lie ahead. These three issues are of primary importance for the ILO; and, proposed by the Director-General, Government, employer and worker delegates should all join together to reaffirm their support in this respect.

The world has witnessed the unwavering efforts of the Organization to promote the economic and social progress of mankind throughout the long years of its existence, firmly based on noble ideals and firm principles. The International Labour Organization, a specialized agency of the United Nations, is fulfilling its share of responsibility in promoting the economic and social advancement of all peoples.

In this context, the Director-General has referred in his Report to the World Employment Programme which was, at one time, regarded as a privileged task of the ILO. This evokes for us memories of the International Development Strategy for the Second United Nations Development Decade which aimed to achieve full employment for all nations of the world. In this regard, it should be recalled that the ILO initiated the World Employment Programme in the 70s.

Myanmar, like other member countries, has actively cooperated with the ILO in implementing national programmes and by participating in regional activities directed towards the eradication of unemployment and the fullest possible utilization of manpower resources.

We are now coming to the close of the 20th century; political and economic changes have taken place in the world arena during this final decade, and still we are witnessing prevalent employment problems which should not be left unchecked for long, as these are not the concern of just one particular nation or region but of the entire world. The availability of dignified and income-generating employment is a basic need for all. Thus, we are very pleased to express our support for any new initiative by the Organization to reactivate the World Employment Programme.

Nations of the world are today devoting their attention and energy to the cause of economic and social development. With the end of the Cold War, the international community is now in a position to create an environment conducive to the success of the endeavours developing countries are making for economic and social progress.

Myanmar is today in a period of nation building and is adopting market-oriented economic policies. The Myanmar Government has taken a series of measures to promote private sector development; the economy is making remarkable progress, registering in 1993-94 6 per cent growth, over the previous year; agricultural production rose by 5.4 per cent; a market economy is now taking shape in Myanmar, and the people of our country are taking advantage of the initiative and possibilities open to them.

Since assuming state responsibility, the State Law and Order Restoration Council Government has been endeavouring to ensure public order and peace while promoting economic reforms. The National Convention has been called together to work out the basic principles for drafting a new and firm Constitution. Nearly 700 delegates, comprising elected representatives, representatives of the national races, political parties, peasants, workers, intelligentsia and technocrats, state service personnel and specially invited persons are all participating in its deliberations.

Following extensive discussions, consensus has been reached on 104 basic principles.

After more than five years of unswerving efforts by the Myanmar Government, we are now enjoying a considerable degree of peace and stability throughout our country. The situation has grown even more encouraging since a total of 11 armed groups from different national races returned to the legal fold to participate in national development endeavours; that they have done so, is an unmistakable testimony of the complete trust and confidence which the national races place in the policy of national reconciliation espoused by the State Law and Order Restoration Council and in the Council's goodwill and sincerity.

So far, there has been substantial progress in every region of the country, thanks to the Government's unrelenting efforts for the development of the nation's states and divisions – including the border areas where several national groups reside. In both urban and rural areas, as well as in these border regions, unprecedented infrastructure development is taking place: schools, hospitals, dispensaries, as well as railways, roads, etc.

Let me conclude by saying that we are committed, as well as determined, to strive for the all-round development of our country in order to bridge the rural and urban gap.

Mr. MOUSHOUTTAS (Minister of Labour and Social Insurance, Cyprus) – On behalf of the delegation of Cyprus, I wish to extend warm and sincere congratulations to the President on his election and to express the conviction that with his qualities and long and varied experience this session of the Conference will, through frank and constructive debate, come to a successful conclusion.

The Director-General of the ILO is to be wholeheartedly congratulated for the theme he has chosen for this year's session of the Conference and for the outstanding Report which he has prepared – a Report which is thorough and rich with ideas and suggestions for a more efficient Organization and a more equitable world where social justice will continue to be one of the fundamental goals to be pursued along with economic and technological development.

Indeed, the 75th anniversary of the ILO provides an excellent opportunity for an overall assessment of the Organization's values, aims, role, means of action and methods of work with a view to defining the policies and action which the Organization should follow in coming years in order to be at once "inventive, effective and respected".

We agree that this re-evaluation has become necessary in view of the tremendous geopolitical upheavals of recent years, but also in view of the rapid globalization of the economy, the changes in the world of work, the proliferation of social and labour problems and the widening inequalities not only between but also within States.

Responding to the invitation of the Director-General, I shall attempt to give our position on some of the precise and specific proposals made in his Report for, unfortunately, time restrictions prevent us from commenting on all the questions, however challenging or interesting they may be.

We agree that the ILO's standard-setting machinery and action should be adapted to deal with pressing social issues, resulting from free international trade and globalization of world production and markets, and that what is needed is a qualitative rather than a quantitative approach to standard-setting. We also find very useful the ideas of supplementing the normal standard-setting with authoritative guidance offered to governmental and non-governmental decision-makers through a sort of "soft law" in fields where conditions and needs change rapidly. Reorienting the general surveys of the Committee of independent experts on unratified instruments towards an evaluation of the instruments to which they relate would also be very useful.

At the same time, we believe that the time has come for the ILO to play a greater role in the international scene, along with other organizations concerned with the world economy, for the ILO, through its tripartite structure, can provide an effective forum for addressing the social aspects of international economic trends and policies – something which is lacking today. Upgrading of the role of the ILO cannot but have a beneficial effect also on the role which ILO constituents themselves can play at the international level.

The idea put forward by the Director-General for the preparation of a major annual report containing an authoritative analysis on the situation of employment and incomes in the world and the impact of economic and financial policies on them is an excellent one. We feel that it would be particularly important if this Report were to propose alternative policies that need to be adopted nationally or internationally to reconcile the need for economic growth and stability with the no less pressing need for more jobs and higher incomes for the poor.

Finally, we wish to express our strong support for the proposal that the International Labour Conference should have a standing item on its agenda on the examination of problems of employment and living standards in the world with a view to the adoption of "a statement reflecting the views of the ILO's tripartite constituency on the goals to be pursued and the policies to be followed".

With regard to Cyprus, social justice and tripartism, based on freedom of association, have become a way of life.

The relationship between social equality and economic efficiency has been tested and affirmed in Cyprus. We firmly believe that an adequate standard of social equality and social protection is a prerequisite for higher productivity in industry and contributes to economic efficiency.

Labour relations during the 1974-76 crisis caused by the invasion of Cyprus by a foreign power demonstrated the adaptability and value of tripartism and greatly contributed to the miraculous revival of the economy.

We now look forward to a quick entry into the economic and political organization of our region, the European Union, and we feel confident that the international community and the Union itself will show understanding and flexibility and exercise their authority so that peace and democracy, as well as economic progress and social justice, will be firmly established on the whole island.

Cyprus within Europe will not be a liability. Fully appreciative of the technical assistance and advice which Cyprus has received from the ILO in a number of fields, during the last decade we have started to cooperate with the ILO in offering technical assistance to other developing countries as well as countries of Central and Eastern Europe in the fields of labour administration, social protection and small enterprise development.

I would like to conclude with the wish that the wide-ranging reflection to which the Report of the Director-General has given rise will lead to the adoption of measures which will enable the Organization better to fulfil its mandate for the benefit of all its constituents and above all to secure the progress of social justice in the world of today and tomorrow.

My Government, which has always been a staunch supporter of the noble objectives set by the founders of the International Labour Organization, will do its share towards upgrading and strengthening social justice in a world under pressure from global economic forces.

Mr. COLLIS (Minister of Labour and Cooperatives, Trinidad and Tobago) – I wish to take this opportunity to join with colleagues who have spoken before me in congratulating the President and Vice-Presidents on their election. May I say that I too find it most fitting that in this 75th year since the founding of the ILO in 1919 a Workers' delegate has been elected to preside over our annual Conference. I am confident that under such able and dynamic leadership our deliberations will undoubtedly be fruitful.

On behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago, and indeed on my own behalf, I would like to extend greetings to fellow delegates and other participants also attending the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. As in previous years, we appreciate this opportunity offered to participants by the ILO to exchange views, share experiences, review developments and trends and consider international instruments.

The year 1994 not only marks the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, but also for us in the Caribbean the 25th anniversary of the opening of the ILO Caribbean Regional Office in Port-of-Spain, Trinidad. I wish to assure you that my country recognizes the significance of these three ILO anniversaries, and I am happy to report that among activities taking place in Trinidad and Tobago in commemoration of these events are (i) a decision by the Government of Trinidad and Tobago to ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144); (ii) the minting of an appropriate postage stamp; (iii) a programme of public relations activities including a public display of an ILO exhibition and the nomination by the social partners of persons who have distinguished themselves over the years in the field of industrial relations, for national awards.

Indeed, the ILO is world renowned, having been a past recipient of, among other awards, the Nobel Peace Prize. In this vein I wish to add my Government's and my own personal tributes to the outstanding work performed by the ILO over the years in its efforts to reconcile development and social justice on the solid and credible basis of tripartism. In this connection, we in Trinidad and Tobago are in the very happy position of having the Caribbean Regional Office located within our borders and we are extremely pleased to have been selected for priority attention by the ILO's Caribbean area multidisciplinary team under the new active partnership policy. In this regard I was very pleased to have recently had the privilege of welcoming to my country Mr. Jean-François Tremeaud, Assistant Director-General of the ILO with responsibility for, inter alia, multidisciplinary teams worldwide.

Indeed, we in Trinidad and Tobago very much welcome the ILO's new active partnership policy which we view as a natural outcome of what may perhaps be perceived as a new dispensation for the ILO worldwide, as signalled by the Director-General in his Report Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda. For our part, we certainly view the theme of the Director-General's Report this year as an invitation to member States to participate in a reassessment, both of the role of the ILO as we move towards the twenty-first century, as well as an acknowledgement of the need to ensure that the relationships between member States and the ILO are made most meaningful in these times as we continue to experience the challenges of financial stringency and structural adjustment.

I note with great pleasure that 1994 also marks the installation of a Government of national unity in South Africa under the astute leadership of President Nelson Mandela. The new South African Government has come to power in a free and fair election on the basis of one person, one vote. Black people in South Africa for the first time have had the right to vote and consequently to participate in the democratic election of the Government of their country. This event serves to demonstrate what united action by the world community and concerted resistance by those directly affected by oppression can achieve. The ultimate eradication of the abhorrent apartheid system from the face of the Earth will be a testimony to the courage, resilience and boundlessness of the indomitable human spirit. It is therefore timely that included on the agenda is the item "Review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa", and I take this opportunity to extend the heartiest of congratulations to President Mandela and members of his Government and to members of the South African delegation represented here at the ILO.

Trinidad and Tobago continues to undergo the process of structural adjustment and to face the challenge of employing structural adjustment policies to serve the cause of growth and social justice in a developing country. We have continued to place greater reliance on the private sector and to reduce the level of state control over the economy. However, we do recognize that, in a country such as ours with high levels of unemployment, a free market left entirely on its own would tend to benefit a select minority rather than serve the general interest of our society. Given the limitations of the market, structural adjustment programmes must ensure that measures are instituted to combat poverty and to protect and develop employment for the poorest segments of the population. Democracy would face stern challenges in the absence of such measures. In this regard, the Government in 1994 has dedicated to a social safety net TT$1.1 billion in a national budget where total recurrent expenditure is TT$7.7 billion. Moreover, the Government continues to make efforts to alleviate unemployment among the poorest of the poor through such mechanisms as our unemployment relief programme. Nevertheless, we recognize that employment levels would be sustainable to the extent that private individuals are able to develop their business capabilities and the Government is prepared to play its part in facilitating such activities.

In 1994 this Conference will again address the issue of part-time work. Current trends in employment practices have given this issue some prominence. There is a tendency worldwide towards, among other things, declining working hours, flexible work schedules and production systems which require flexibility. Part-time work therefore is emerging as an important instrument of employment generation. Consequently, in developing countries experiencing high levels of unemployment, careful consideration must be give to ensuring the economic viability of employers as well as protecting workers from abuse.

I note that our agenda also includes an item on safety and health in mines. Although mining as an activity does not make as significant a contribution to our national income and employment as in many other countries of the world, we recognize that in many countries mining remains the most hazardous industrial occupation and in this connection I would wish to iterate my Government's commitment to protecting the working environment. Towards this end, a comprehensive occupational safety and health Bill, covering virtually all persons at work, will be put before our Parliament shortly.

I observe that also included on the agenda is the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. In this respect it is noted that chiefly responsible for the development of such agencies were certain shortcomings of the public employment services in addressing the rise in unemployment and in responding with flexibility to specific requests of employers, notwithstanding the potential for abuse by private employment agencies in the absence of adequate safeguards.

The more successful economies of the world have been characterized by less antagonistic labour-management relations. There is need, therefore, for countries to strengthen labour-management linkages which maximize constructive discussions between the social partners. It is better to avoid the tremendous cost of industrial unrest than to repair the damage resulting from neglect of labour-management relations. On a related issue, I note with positive interest the proposal of the Director-General for the ILO, at the request of parties and subject to the approval of the government in question, to intervene in the settlement of serious labour disputes by way of mediation and arbitration.

At the very foundation of the ILO is the principle of tripartism. In this context the Government of Trinidad and Tobago supports the view that the promotion of social justice in the field of labour could be achieved if the social partners are themselves involved in the search for appropriate solutions. I am happy to report that in my country there is widespread adoption of the principle of tripartism as demonstrated in such institutions as our National Insurance Board, National Training Board, our Registration, Recognition and Certification Board, our Minimum Wages Board and our Cabinet appointed tripartite committees established to address the issues of labour legislation generally, and our industrial relations in particular.

I finally pray God's blessings on this Conference and hope that we may advance further towards the attainment of the noble objectives of the Organization.

Original Turkish: Mr. MOGULTAY (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Turkey) – At the outset I would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election and express my confidence that under their able guidance the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference will fulfil its task in the best possible manner.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the new members of the ILO, Oman, Turkmenistan and Tajikistan. I also congratulate South Africa on the resumption of its membership.

I wish also to congratulate the Director-General on the comprehensive report he has prepared for this Conference.

It is timely that the Report of the Director-General this year addresses the prospects facing the ILO. Nothing could be more appropriate and natural for the ILO on the memorable occasion of its 75th anniversary than to look back in its past and evaluate its place and function in a changing world.

It is true that the liberalization of trade has the potential to accelerate economic growth and thereby improve working conditions and create employment.

It is also true that there can be no development based on exploitation, deprivation and restrictions of social rights. We should not allow the balance between these two elements, trade liberalization and economic growth on the one hand, and social rights on the other, to be shifted at the expense of the latter. Nevertheless, we have noticed that those who disregard all social concerns and favour an unleashed type of competition are becoming more vocal.

As you may recall, in the speech I made from this rostrum last year, I expressed my deep concern over this tendency and referred to the Preamble of the ILO Constitution, stating that economic development can be achieved together with social justice and that the ILO should maintain its stance for the preservation of this principle. At that time we felt the need to make a sound assessment of recent developments.

The topic selected for the Report of the Director-General this year gives us this opportunity.

The Director-General has made this assessment effectively and capably. In his Report the developments that have marked recent years as well as their implications are reflected in their real dimensions; the validity of the values, structures and functions of the ILO are analyzed in the light of these developments. The Report also seeks to identify ways of maintaining the balance which I mentioned earlier under the new conditions which we call globalization.

Before expressing my views on these proposals, with your permission I would like to indicate the importance we attach as the Government of Turkey to the balance between the solution of economic problems and social rights, by giving as an example two sets of measures we introduced this year.

The economic stabilization package that we have been implementing as of 5 April 1994 in order to cut down the public sector borrowing requirement and to achieve a more healthy budget includes – apart from such measures as new taxes, etc. – a substantial programme of privatization and the closure of inefficient state economic enterprises that cannot be privatized. The package also contains measures for eliminating the adverse consequences of privatization on workers, including measures giving priority in re-employment to those who lose their job as a result of privatization or closure, paying an adequate amount of unemployment compensation and unemployment benefits for a certain period of time, or assisting those workers who wish to re-establish their own business.

The second package is part of our continuous democratization efforts. It was announced on 18 May 1994 shortly after the launching of the economic stabilization programme and comprises some 62 bills. This package contains a chapter aimed at minimizing the difficulties caused by the economic austerity measures.

The bill on the ratification of Convention No. 158 is one of these measures.

Another is the introduction of bills that have already been prepared in consultation with the social partners with a view to creating a working environment in conformity with the ILO standards, enhancing the freedom and independence of trade unions and their internal democracy, and developing autonomy in collective agreements and limiting further the scope of strike restrictions.

Efforts to enact the bill on protection against unjust termination of the employment contract shall be speeded up.

The unemployment insurance bill which aims at providing a certain amount of income security in case of unemployment is currently on the agenda of the Council of Ministers. It shall be submitted to Parliament as soon as possible.

No effort will be spared in order to secure the passage of the bill concerning the principles governing trade unions, collective labour agreements and the right to strike in the public sector, in accordance with the provisions of Conventions No. 87 and No. 151 which we ratified last year.

After this brief report on the attitude of the Turkish Government, which does not neglect the social dimension even as it is attempting to overcome the economic crisis, I now turn to the proposals made by the Director-General.

I fully support his proposal regarding the better adaptation of the standard-setting activities of the ILO to real and pressing needs. I also support his view of approaching the subject in qualitative rather than quantitative terms.

In order to overcome the difficulties arising from the liberalization of international trade and the globalization of world production and markets, I find the following proposal made by the Director-General most useful: The awarding of a "social label" to multinational enterprises that subscribe voluntarily to certain standards of codes of conduct. This might render them more valuable in the eyes of consumer organizations.

In addition to this measure related to standard-setting, I am in favour of giving the ILO a significant role to play as a leader in the establishment of a forum where the social aspects of international economic tendencies and policies might be dealt with, and equipping the ILO with the necessary authority and means so as to enable it with its unique tripartite structure, values and experience, to play its part effectively in this forum.

I fully support the notion that productive and freely chosen employment, which is the first priority of policy-makers all over the world, should be made the centre-piece of all activities carried out by the ILO. In this context, I believe the following proposals made by the Director-General are extremely useful.

A major annual report should be issued containing an authoritative analysis of the situation of employment and income in the world and the impact of economic and financial policies on them. Such a report should contain alternative policies with a view to reconciling the need for providing more jobs and more income for the poor and to promote growth and stability.

The Conference should have as a standing item on its agenda the examination of employment and living standards in the world.

Our Government, like other governments, aims to find immediate solutions to problems of employment. In this context I would like to mention two projects which were put into effect last year, one of which is in the preparatory stage.

The first project, prepared in cooperation with the World Bank, amounts to US$107 million. This consists of programmes such as labour force training and labour market information systems. Within the framework of this project, some 73,000 unemployed Turkish citizens shall be trained and placed in suitable jobs in the next five years.

The second project aims to restructure the Turkish Employment Agency. Within the scope of this project the agency will be transformed into an effective and modern institution to fight unemployment and to develop jobs. The bill envisaging change in the functions and structure of the agency as well as aiming to provide additional sources of revenue has been submitted to the Prime Minister's office.

An overview of the proposals made by the Director-General in his Report will reveal that the fundamental point is the establishment of international recognition of tripartism. As a Minister of a Government that ratified Convention No. 144 and five other ILO Conventions last year, and that later began work on the establishment of a body with consultative capacity to advise the Government on social and economic matters, I wish to express my firm belief in the useful role of tripartism and the role it can play in creating a new equilibrium in a changing world.

Before concluding I feel it is my duty to express my gratitude to all those who have contributed to the celebration programme of the 75th anniversary of the ILO. We have planned in this context a series of activities throughout our country to last through 1994.

I wish the ILO every success in its march towards spreading respect for human rights and freedoms, establishing democracy, achieving social justice and fighting poverty, to which it has devoted 75 years of long and honourable efforts.

Believing that the ILO will continue its advance in the same direction in keeping with its mandate, adapting itself to a changing world, I also wish a successful conclusion to this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

Original Arabic: Mr. KHALIL EL FADHEL (Minister of Social Affairs, Tunisia) – In the name of God the Merciful, the Compassionate! First of all I should like to join those who have preceded me here to congratulate sincerely Mr. Charles Gray, the American Workers' delegate, on his election as President of the 81st Session of the Conference

In this connection, I believe that the choice of Mr. Gray to direct the work of this session, which is to discuss the future of the Organization, is an indication of confidence in his skill and experience, and eloquent proof of the attachment of the organization to tripartism.

This year our Organization will have been in existence for three-quarters of a century. Ever since its creation, and even during the periods of international tension, it worked for dialogue and consultation between the social partners. As a result, it was possible to take up the challenges, broaden the spectrum of fundamental freedoms and protect human rights. Today it is preparing to adapt its working methods and means of intervention to the demands of the global economy, in order to instil social justice and give a human slant to world economic relations.

His Excellency, President Ben Ali has instructed me to transmit his best wishes to the ILO on its 75th anniversary and to stress his great esteem for the Organization by virtue of its tireless efforts to promote labour and development.

I would like to take this opportunity to reiterate how far Tunisia is attached to the noble ideals pursued by the ILO and its desire to see them become reality. We are also extremely proud of the Organization's achievements in the area of social legislation and technical cooperation.

During my country's recent celebrations to mark the 75th anniversary of the ILO, we emphasized, through the media, its aims ad achievements, and held cultural events, including in institutes to raise the awareness of students.

I would also like to pay homage to the Director-General for his Report which gives an objective analysis of the world economic situation and makes practical proposals on how to promote international cooperation in order to re-examine how the new social problems arising at the international level are being dealt with.

We also welcome the fact that in his Report, the Director-General conjured up many concerns, which reminded us of those felt in Tunisia with regard to overall development. This holds true also for methods of analysis and the approach to finding solutions which correspond to our socio-economic situation.

The turning point of 7 November 1987 was the time when Tunisia was first able to move towards finding consensus, which as the Director-General pointed out, is so important. Our country, which has time and again sought consensus has been able to marry political change with an economic restructuring programme and a forward-thinking social policy.

Tunisia has been successful in consolidating freedoms, including freedom of association and in creating a climate of confidence among the social partners, which has helped them to shoulder their responsibilities with complete independence, whilst taking full account of general interests.

This democratic process has led to consensus on the countries present and future in the light of the radical changes taking place in the world, and united efforts to reconcile as positively as possible the need of economic growth and social welfare, in an atmo sphere of mutual respect for the fundamental differ ences of the various parties.

In this way, consensus has been reached in Tunisi on the practical methods needed to solve the prob lems of employment, occupational safety and health problems which have been included on the agenda this session. We have adopted the approach of dia logue and negotiation in order to strengthen the le gislative provisions on these issues, and thus amend ing the relevant sections of the Labour Code.

In this context, I appreciated the Director-Gen eral's insistence on the need to turn to the appropri ate mechanisms to help cope with the negative im pact on the employment market, the widening social disparities, the increasing poverty and the in ability to meet the fundamental needs of human be ings.

This is even more worrying because the hopes tha a more judicious use would be made of funds ear marked for arms at the end of the Cold War have no materialized; and the globalization of the econom has only worsened the situation because of the majo burden being borne by the developing countries particularly the weakest members of society.

I noted with interest the Director-General's wis to participate actively in the World Summit for Soci Development. We are sure that our presence will b profitable for the Summit because of our vast exper ence; and we are also convinced that because of it tripartite nature, it is the Organization most suited t express the social concerns of our era and to defen the cause of social justice among economic and f nancial institutions.

More than ever before our Organization is bein called upon to move away from its traditional acti ities of standard-setting to propose specific solution to the social problems prevailing in the world and t develop new forms of international cooperatio based on active partnership and development for al

If we are to make any comments on the Directo
General's Report it is to say that, in spite of the man references to the interdependence of interests countries, it has failed to emphasize sufficiently th need to find solutions in an overall revision of inte national economic relations. This is no doubt due t many factors, amongst which, and I quote: "the lac or ineffectiveness of formal institutional arrange ments that would enable the ILO to influence th policies and activities of the major international ec nomic and financial institutions".

While agreeing with the Director-General's con viction that development is the responsibility of eac country, we believe that technical cooperation ca provide global solutions to meet the various cha lenges and that our Organization is capable of pro posing alternatives within the framework of the lib eralization of international trade; it is also able t establish rules for economic competition, by optin for equitable standards that take into account th weight of the foreign debt and the social burden countries, whilst taking care of the weaker econo mies – the victims of the worsening of the rates exchange and devaluation.

We also believe that our Organization should tak more account of the number of constructive pro posals and back them – when they can meet deve opment objectives. This comment could apply to th proposal made by President Ben Ali in the speech he made to the European Parliament in June 1993, while presiding over the Arab Maghreb Union; in his speech he suggested that funds collected from the repayment of foreign debt should be earmarked for development and environmental protection.

Furthermore, while acknowledging that the majority of technical cooperation programmes should be aimed at assisting the least developed countries, we feel that our Organization should also assist other developing countries – including Tunisia – which need programmes that take into account the strengthening of democracy, social dialogue, social protection and the integration of weaker members of society.

Tunisia, which is at present hosting the 30th Assembly of African Heads of State and Government, is particularly honoured that the first Head of State of South Africa is attending this meeting; indeed, it is most auspicious that this coincides with the suspension by our Organization of the Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid.

We also welcome that the first step has been taken on the road to peace in Palestine and we hope that all the provisions in the agreement reached will be duly applied. In this respect, we should all strive to ensure that peace efforts lead to the freeing of all occupied Arab territories so that peace and safety may reign in the region.

Over the years our Organization has, by its unstinting efforts and with its considerable experience, convinced us all that cooperation between countries is a far better alternative to conflict; no international order, whatever its characteristics and level of sophistication, can make any claims to stability if it has been unable to meet the needs and interests of the various groups and communities on the basis of justice and social equality.

Let us all draw inspiration from these principles and move forward together to help not only developing countries but also the developed countries.

Mr. CASSAR (Parliamentary Secretary, Ministry of Education and Human Resources, Malta) – I should like to start by congratulating the Director-General for his excellent examination of the ILO in the changing context of the world. It could hardly be bettered.

I would like to offer four main reflections built on four central points made in the course of the report which tie up with items which are close to the concerns of my Government and the people of Malta.

The first is the crisis of the nation State. I do not think it necessary to add anything to the analysis of the phenomenon itself as it is presented in the report. What I wish to do is to indicate an area where it may be possible for the ILO to make a contribution which it, and it alone, may be in a position to make.

It is well known that Malta has made its deepest mark in world affairs through the introduction of the concept of the common heritage of mankind in international law, beginning with its application to the deep seabed. The recognition of the "common heritage" of mankind meant the recognition that there were resources, the nature of which excluded their subjection to either national sovereignty or private appropriation. The nation State was not an adequate instrument for their management, nor were profit-motivated companies. It was recognized that some new form of management structure was necessary. The system actually proposed and agreed in the Treaty has proved to be much too cumbersome and unworkable. Yet, there is a crying need for a type of management structure which is not modelled either on that of the capitalist private firm, or on that of the classical state-owned enterprise; it should be capable, however, of operating effectively at the international level.

There is perhaps no symptom which manifests more eloquently the crisis of the nation State than the growth and power of the multinational companies, the typical expression of the prevalent trends in the globalized economy. Gradually in the same way as at the national level, there emerged as a kind of golden moral mean, distinct from either the capitalist or the state-run enterprise, a form of management structure – that of the cooperative, with the emphasis on active participation in shared benefits. In our times, the cooperative counterpart of the multinational enterprise should emerge at the international level . It would be the most appropriate management structure, not only for those resources which have been already officially declared common heritage of mankind, but also in many other fields such as those of knowledge and know-how which are not likely to be made subject to the principle in the short run.

Obviously, it is not the function of the ILO to bring bodies with the kind of management structure envisaged into being. But it could be the ILO's function to orient thought in that direction and even to devise model legal frameworks which could facilitate the ushering into being of what might be called "multinational cooperatives". That might also be the direction in which an answer to the dilemma between wholesale privatization and anachronistic statalism could be found.

Secondly, the crisis of the nation State links up to the crisis in industrial organization which could be labelled "from Taylorism to Toyotism" – the adoption of the so-called "lean" and sometimes "mean" systems of production. A principal result of this structural change in the organization of work at the enterprise level is the onset of structural unemployment. Here it is important to keep stressing that work is a human right, a fundamental human right, but at the same time one has to take account of the concrete conditions under which the right can only be exercised. Forms of part-time employment are often being proposed if not as the solution, at least as a necessary palliative to the ills of unemployment. Speaking as the representative of a country which in the last years has succeeded, in its smallness, to drive the wolf of unemployment fairly effectively from its door, I feel authorized again to echo an appeal I have already made a year ago to this Assembly – namely that serious attention be paid to the informal economy. It is the informal sector which explains the otherwise inexplicable flourishing of certain local economies, even in a time of world recession. It is the recognition of this reality and the establishment of fair-play within it that can prevent a source of economic advantage from becoming also a source of social blight. The reason for my recalling these points today is the belief that part-time employment can only be an acceptable resort in the face of threatening or rampant unemployment, if it means that part-time workers are able to put the time they are freed from unemployment to productive or even creative use in fields of their own initiative or, in other words, in the informal economy, legitimized and fortified against injustice. I strongly believe that if the ILO turns much more attention to what needs doing in the informal sector of the economy it will be making a major contribution in facing up successfully to the great industrial and technological revolution at present under way.

A third, also related, critical area in the western world is the crisis of the "welfare state". The crisis is not just a matter of a welfare bill which becomes too heavy to bear because of such factors as increasing ageing populations, larger armies of unemployed, or marginalized members of society; the kind of assistance traditionally given by the welfare state, mostly financial and institutionalized, lacks the human element because of its depersonalization and bureaucratization. This is particularly true in work-related services, such as employment agencies. In my country, we are striving to allocate new roles to state-aided, voluntary organizations, and as much as possible to encourage these to operate in a family-centre manner rather than on an individual-centred basis.

I would like to point out that there is a large open space for international initiatives, although of a difficult kind. Welfare services have increasingly to be operated through specific funds of one kind or another of insurance basis. It is obvious that such funds could be much more humanly valuable if they could operate on an international basis on agreed criteria of equitableness. Once again, I cannot suggest that it falls within the ILO's mandate or possibilities to bring about the parallel development of integration at the level of social welfare provisions, such as insurance systems against unemployment, as is occurring in the economic, if not the political, sphere.

But I am suggesting that the prospecting and projecting of the sketching out and canvassing the possible ways in which systems of work-related social benefits could possibly be internationalized on a cooperative and progressive basis – and could also be a positive contribution to some humanization of the global economy.

Fourthly, and finally, the three crises I have spoken about in the political, the economic and the social spheres converge at the deepest level of all – that of values. The challenge here is that competition appears to be increasingly acknowledged to be almost an absolute and practically the supreme value. Against this, it is fitting that we should record that the values embodied in the 1944 Declaration of Philadelphia are still valid. It is important that the welcome downfall of over-centralized state systems should not imply the triumph of unbridled capitalism. No less a body than the Lisbon Group of the Club of Rome, which once issued the clarion call for "limits of growth", is now eloquently appealing for "limits to competition".

Indeed, the Lisbon Group is right in emphasizing the fact that for the effectiveness of the free market itself, a framework of cooperation is a necessary asset. Competitiveness can only yield its genuine benefits to the economy if it is enveloped and fostered within a structure of generally accepted and applied rules rooted in the common interest and the common good. Because of its history and nature, its achievements of the past, and the evident clairvoyance of its present perceptions, the ILO is perhaps the institution best suited to serve as the very emblem or standard-bearer of the often blurred idea: that it is the cooperative principle which is the sine qua non of fruitful competitiveness.

Mr. POPESCU (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Romania) – I have the honour on behalf of the Romanian delegation to congratulate the President on the occasion of his election to chair this important session of the Conference and to wish him every success in carrying out the highly responsible mission which has been entrusted to him. I would also like to express my congratulations to the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on the Report presented to this session of the Conference. It is a significant document which provides an analysis of and pertinent approach to the future trends of ILO's activity in the context of the political and socio-economic transformations in the world.

Celebrating at this session, together with all member States, the 75th anniversary of the establishment of the ILO, Romania, one of its founders, joins with the unanimous appreciation of its long and fruitful activity in preserving a durable peace by promoting social justice, an important objective included also in its Constitution and reiterated in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

An activity of three-quarters of a century in the service of social justice undoubtedly represents a triumph which should be continued and enriched.

We appreciate the evaluations made in the Director-General's Report concerning the radical transformations that are taking place in the international arena. Real foundations have been laid by putting an end to a bipolar world system and, implicitly to divergent positions and the conflictual relations which have existed for many years, so that we might have constructive debates on essential matters such as, first of all, the elimination of inequities between and within States. We cannot but lament that the process of structural adjustments under way in Eastern and Central European countries during this period of transition is accompanied by a significant decrease in production, a high unemployment rate and growing inflation which has negative effects on the living standards of a large section of the population. It is true that the situation could also be seen as a consequence of the policy of these States, consisting in endeavours aimed at finding a balance between the State, the market and the civil society on the way towards democracy.

Moreover, we cannot ignore the fact which is also mentioned in the Report that the globalization of the economy has potential risks and aggravates the negative impact on employment unless we find adequate formulae for a new balance between reducing unfair competition and promoting free access to international trade.

Considering the rich experience of the ILO, we hope that together with governments, workers' and employers' organizations it will succeed in replacing old and rigid mechanisms with flexible, realistic forms in order to reach the common goals and further justice and social progress.

The process of restructuring the economy, as in the other countries of this region of Europe, involves social pressures in Romania, too. This explains the constant preoccupation of the Executive with regard to revising the social protection system and limiting the transition's effects especially on the protection of the most disadvantaged sectors of the population.

So, the amendments to the Unemployment Act submitted to Parliament provide for advantageous credits to the unemployed to help them to set up small and medium-sized enterprises, and aim to extend professional training and facilitate the employment of young graduates.

New regulations will be adopted with respect to the establishment of a social allowance for the people who do not have the material means to ensure a decent living standard, to protect minors in difficult situations, and generalize flexible or part-time working programmes, especially for women.

Of course, the level and the quality of social protection depend on the quantity and efficiency of labour and on productivity, taking into account that the Government's resources are directly proportional to the volume of the social labour done with regard to creating goods and services.

Bearing in mind the other items on the agenda of this session of the Conference, I should like to present our considerations in a few words.

First of all, we appreciate the fact that the objectives of continuing the process of democracy in some specific segments of the Organization, of consolidating institutional capacities by supporting the government and administrative structures of the member States throughout the transitional period, and of strengthening tripartism are being preserved within the ILO programmes.

In order to consolidate the tripartite mechanism in Romania, a bill was worked out on the establishment of an Economic and Social Council which is a consultative body and a forum of social dialogue at the national level designed to facilitate the union of the two social partners' efforts and of the Government as mediator.

The Romanian delegation also appreciates the fact that safety and health in mines have been included on this session's agenda, this being a problem to which we have granted special attention during the past years.

I avail myself of this opportunity to tell you that we welcome the preoccupations of the secretariat of this Organization and the Director-General with regard to adjusting the whole activity of the ILO to reflect international developments by firmly adopting adequate reforms.

Before concluding, I wish to express my thanks for the technical assistance given to Romania in restructuring and modernizing mainly the labour force and services for the unemployed, and improving the social protection system in general.

I assure the Conference that the Government of Romania is fully committed to fruitful collaboration with the ILO.

Mr. FALBR (Workers' delegate, Czech Republic) – First sincere congratulations to our colleague Charles Gray on his election to the position of President of this Session of the International Labour Conference. We highly appreciate this significant honour for a representative of the Workers' group at a time when we are commemorating the 75th anniversary of the establishment of the International Labour Organization. We understand it also as a gesture of appreciation of the important role workers' representatives have been playing in the activities of the ILO.

The anniversary we are currently commemorating has been the source of various debates on the future role of this unique and universal organization in the framework of the United Nations system. Discussions going on at various levels and within all three groups at the International Labour Organization have inevitably been reflected in the main report of the Director-General of the ILO; a report which tries to explore new ways of further developing its capability and effectiveness to enable the ILO to effectively address the changing labour conditions in the present world. Let me briefly express the views and positions on these issues held by the Czecho-Moravian Chamber of Trade Unions which represents more than 3 million Czech trade unionists.

We highly appreciate that the Director-General emphasizes in his Report the significance of tripartism as a key principle not only of the Organization as a whole but also as a fundamental precondition for any discussion when seeking solutions to the current great problems of the world. There is no doubt of the specific importance of tripartism for the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, the countries in transition. It is our firm belief that negotiations and efforts to achieve consensus among governments, employers and unions is the only way to secure a successful transformation, without greater conflicts and social tension. Unfortunately we often witness doubts, lack of confidence or rejection not only by civil servants but also by certain newly emerged private entrepreneurs and employers. It is obvious that the practical application and support of tripartism on the national level should also be one of the main tasks of the ILO in the future. Among others, the frequently discussed issue of adoption of a new ILO Convention on tripartism at the national level emerges once more as a necessity.

The issue of ILO standards is one of the most frequently discussed problems of future ILO activity. It is necessary to stress here – as the Director-General has also done in his Report – that the ILO has a great responsibility to defend fundamental human and trade union rights. Therefore, it is impossible to reduce the future significance of key ILO Conventions such as those concerning freedom of association and discrimination which make up the cornerstones on which the ILO was built. A number of cases show that serious attempts to violate these fundamental rights, inseparably linked with freedom and democracy, do occur. Similar tendencies can be found in all Central and Eastern European countries.

As far as the future creation of standards is concerned, the problem is to be tackled very sensitively in order not to substitute them gradually by less binding documents which, according to the Director-General, would have the form of so-called "soft laws". We would like to say a clear "no" to such a philosophy. It is necessary to realize that for the workers and unions in many countries the ILO Conventions and Recommendations often represent one of their few supports in their struggle for rights and social guarantees.

In this context I would like to make a comment concerning the situation in the Czech Republic and in other countries which not long ago rid themselves of communist regimes with their centralized economies, and which now strive for the democratic transformation of their societies including the introduction of market economies. As I already mentioned, this process is complicated and has negative social repercussions. This process is strongly influenced by the financial policies of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank which are both well known as not being very socially oriented. We consider as unsatisfactory the statement that up until now the ILO has not succeeded in in-depth negotiations with these financial institutions. We understand the complexity of the situation, nevertheless, we believe that in future the ILO should use more of its weight, authority and mandate and try – at least in individual cases together with national governments and workers' and employers' organizations – to help solve various problems, especially if the top representatives of the IMF ostensibly express the need to strengthen the "social pillar" in the framework of contemporary economic changes.

In the short time I have at my disposal it is unfortunately impossible to mention all the problems the ILO faces in the year of its 75th anniversary. We think that each of the delegates at this Conference is especially interested in an even better and more effective performance of the ILO in the future, and in it fully honouring the mandate with which it was entrusted when it was established. Therefore, I oriented my address more to the spheres where its activity could be further improved. On the other hand, we must not forget the considerable work the ILO has done since its foundation for the benefit of workers, employers and the general social development of nations worldwide. We believe that the ILO in its uniqueness will continue its noble mission well into the future.

In conclusion, I would like to thank the ILO for all the assistance which has been granted to our unions in various fields since their foundation as new democratic organizations four years ago. We believe that also in the future years which undoubtedly will not be easy for workers in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, we can rely upon your help.

Original Spanish: Mr. MELO ACOSTA (Government delegate, Colombia) – Our congratulations to the President for his election to the presidency of this Conference which is of such great symbolic importance since we are celebrating the 75th anniversary of our Organization. Might I also express a word of welcome to our new member States and more particularly to the delegation of South Africa which has now joined once again in our deliberations after so many years of absence.

It is a matter of satisfaction and pride for me to participate in this Conference as a Government delegate, particularly and precisely at this point in time when the International Labour Organization is commemorating its 75th anniversary, that is to say, the 75th anniversary of its creation and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The ILO is the international organization which has made the most important contribution to establishing social justice as a cornerstone in the effort to achieve universal peace.

On behalf of the people of Colombia, led by our President, César Gaviria Trujillo, on behalf of my delegation, the delegation I am representing, and on my own behalf, I would like to express my sincere appreciation and admiration to the constituents of the Organization and to all people who since 1919 through their work, expertise, dedication and det mination have made it possible for the ILO to fu the aims and objectives for which it was created.

I would like to pay a special word of tribute Albert Thomas for his invaluable contribution, b his thinking and his forceful action. More than e before, the Organization expects and hopes that decisions of its Members will honour the legacy that unique personality. I also wish to pay tribute Mr. Jairo Escobar, of Colombian nationality, who more than two decades, as a representative of employers' organization, enriched the deliberati of the Organization's Governing Body.

The phenomenon of the globalization of the ec omy to which the Report of the Director-Gene draws our attention directly affects the projects, stitutions and values which contribute to achiev the ultimate aim of humanity, which is to live peace. A world such as ours, which is in the throes far-reaching radical changes, presupposes that th is always a constant threat to social balance.

In the Preamble to the Constitution of the Or nization attention is drawn nevertheless to the cou which has to be taken when we deal with challen such as those we are facing at present, that is to s "universal and lasting peace can be established o if it is based on social justice".

There is no doubt that the main task of int national organizations such as the ILO is in direct its efforts to ensure that we can achieve a situat within countries which enhances the creation consolidation of increasingly higher standards of ing for the people through what we would like term the "globalization of social justice". It is nec sary to understand that this should not mean a co pulsory levelling of social costs but rather a progr sive and gradual process whereby the most import political decisions taken by the countries are ba on the guiding principles which are universally rec nized and which are contained in the Declaration Philadelphia with a view to achieving universal so justice.

This process should take into consideration the alities of each country so as to ensure its posit development without imposing conditions w which it is impossible to comply. The achieving social justice is a challenge which involves should affect all constituents of the Organizat meeting here and actions taken toward this should be appropriate to the tripartism of the IL

That is why we are of the view that at the pres moment there is a confirmation of the standard-s ting machinery, cooperation and control shaped implemented by the ILO in order that through constituents the objectives of the Organization n be achieved. At the same time, they are slowly steadily attaining social justice at higher lev among nations, bearing in mind the peculiarities each member State through analysis and tripar consensus.

It is imperative, however, to seek and apply dar and innovative solutions to the complex challen facing our world today in the task of the pract implementation of the aims of the Organizati which is what the Director-General proposes in Report. I welcome therefore the invitation of the rector-General to reflect on the role which the I should adopt in our contemporary world and the r chinery necessary for it to be able to play this r

Thus, for example, as regards the so-called social clause, I would like to reiterate in this forum the position of the Government of Colombia, according to which it is appropriate to accept it provided that the conditions of work are improved and social justice promoted.

Nevertheless, I should also draw attention to the fact that this clause should not permit the indirect introduction of obstacles to trade which would replace those recently eliminated by the newly created World Trade Organization. The social clause cannot be converted into yet another trade barrier against developing countries such as ours, which are trying to adapt gradually their economies and regulations to the standards of justice attained by the more developed countries.

We do not feel that one can tackle this subject without the full participation of the ILO and its decision-making bodies because, amongst other reasons, the social clause cannot be divorced from the vast standard-setting activities of the Organization and the tripartite manner in which decisions are adopted.

The ILO is the natural forum in which to discuss these matters – matters which directly affect the social actors currently involved in change. Although it certainly should not be responsible for regulating international trade, it is also true that the encouragement of social progress is the task of its member States. Nevertheless, the leadership of the ILO in this delicate task should be guided by a modern, up-to-date vision which represents a true and authentic contribution to the discussions.

The anxieties generated by the concept of the social clause threaten to create an imbalance in the work and decision-taking by the international organizations involved in this area.

Together with the social clause there should be an ILO "economic clause", which would make it possible to define the scope of obligations of the Organization's member States, depending on the relevant level of our development. It is obvious that the obligation to achieve social justice through the implementation of standards adopted by the Organization is part of the social clause, but it is also important to strengthen the harmonization of conditions of economic competition, going well beyond what was achieved by the Uruguay Round and creating an economic situation which is more equitable as a mechanism whereby the less-developed countries may reach higher levels of economic growth and greater social justice.

On the other hand, we believe that the ILO's role in the concert of nations, in addition to being based on universal validity, is also based on the services it offers its constituents.

So, for example, we should highlight the ability of the Organization to support the Ministries of Labour of the less-developed countries. Usually these institutions lack adequate infrastructure and the instruments that are necessary to formulate social and labour policies which are adapted to their particular realities, as well as mechanisms allowing them to effectively exercise control and implement the social standards included and adopted by the ILO.

Therefore it would be desirable not only to see the incorporation of new standards in national legislations, but also the definition, designing and implementation of mechanisms which will contribute to their realization in each of the countries. To this end control procedures of Ministries of Labour must be improved to make them more effective. Their capacity to formulate policies with a view to being able to better interpret the needs and necessary social solutions must also be strengthened.

Obviously the contributions which can be made by the ILO to defining the social clause must be based on a perspective of change, and must give appropriate consideration to the new international political economic structure, as well as possible changes in the future.

The Government of Colombia fully agrees with the philosophy and the values of the Organization and reiterates its full and absolute commitment to its guiding principles, while reaffirming its conviction that social justice is a valid and irreplaceable tool for attaining social justice.

It is up to us, as constituents of the ILO, to take decisions that will fine-tune the machinery it employs to implement its principles in this changing world we live in, so that we may further the noble mission entrusted to it by its founders.

Mr. FOKEER (Minister of Labour and Industrial Relations, Mauritius) – It is a great honour for me to address this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, which is marking the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

I wish to convey to the President, on behalf of the Republic of Mauritius, my warmest congratulations on his election to the presidency of this very important gathering and to extend them to the Vice-Presidents. I can assure the President of the full cooperation of my delegation in fulfilling his challenging task and I am confident that under his able guidance the discussions at this Conference will yield positive results.

Seventy-five years have lapsed since the ILO was created as an outgrowth of the social thought of the nineteenth century to champion the cause of labour and relieve the untold hardships endured in the wake of the industrial revolution. Throughout its existence, the ILO has earned the reputation of an organization imbued with the fundamental purpose of protecting and promoting freedom of association and social justice and civil liberties. On the basis of its mandate expounded by the Declaration of Philadelphia, our organization has become a seedbed for the emergence of a cohesive legacy of principles which provide useful signposts along the way for positive development. Its basic Conventions have always formed an indispensable springboard for achieving acceptable change and for moulding democratic industrial systems. At the same time, technical cooperation has developed considerably and has become the principle mechanism by which the ILO has promoted awareness of its social philosophy.

This twin celebration of the creation of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia comes at a historic moment in this present watershed of human development. Within less than a decade, we have witnessed global changes which never occurred before. The recent first time all-race elections in South Africa, giving political power to the majority after centuries of abject discrimination, is this century's most significant world event. We are proud to belong to an Organization which has been working for 30 years to secure the abolition of apartheid, and has in its own way contributed to this event. This august assembly still echoes the inspiring words of Mr. Nelson Mandela at the 77th Session of the International Labour Conference when he affirmed that "the road ... to travel to arrive at the liberation ... is not too long". Democratization is now on the move in South Africa. It is a time for many hopes and also of great patience. True equality among citizens of this new democracy may take time to evolve, due to the implanted imbalances – a legacy of a political system. South Africa more than ever needs our support to correct the entrenched socio-economic inequality. At this stage, I wish to recall the resolution concerning South Africa adopted at our Eighth African Regional Conference held in Mauritius this year. This resolution calls upon all member States to continue to support, through all possible means, the process of transition to a democratic and non-racial South Africa and the final abolition of apartheid and its consequences.

The democratic processes which have taken place in Eastern Europe, Asia, Southern America and Africa are landmarks which could never be thought of ten years ago. Even the peace process in the Middle East seems to be a miracle.

The re-emergence of democracy brings the hope of peace and prosperity. Yet some zones of ethnic, political and religious intolerance have become the scourge of our times. This new upsurge of ethnonationalism leading to resurgence of discrimination is taking the place of earlier antagonisms between politic-economic systems. These conflicts have strained the capacity of mankind to find timely solutions in order to bring peace to these hotbeds of violence, thus threatening the economic development of many States. Indeed the increase in the number of the poor is now a stark reality attributed primarily to political and civil strife. To those people the problem is one of survival rather than development. But growth of poverty is not an uncontrollable variable as it can be alleviated by policy decisions, for we live in a world that has the means and ability to lift them out of conditions that defy any definition of human decency. So let us do it now when it is still time. Delay in any form to alleviate poverty is the deadliest form of denial of a decent living.

In contrast, we have to recognize that humanity has been hurtling into the future at an accelerated pace due to its inventive genius and wisdom. Technological innovation, a product of man's virtuosity, has to such an extent been the driving force of economic growth that the whole outlook on mankind has been transformed; and the world has irrevocably become one to the extent that we can no longer afford to escape the consequences of events occurring anywhere on the globe. We now speak of globalization of economic relationships which have changed the industrial landscape and economic behaviour of nations. The business environment is today marked by intensifying international competition and the speed with which the world market is evolving, raises major social problems due to the differences in the capacity of nations to adjust to these global economic forces. It threatens to impose a heavy economic penalty on those countries that fail to catch up.

Widespread industrial restructuring has again made labour standards a subject of debate. Labour market institutions and social policies, a critical ingredient of industrial organization, are no longer sheltered from external influence. Advocates of greater flexibility argue that labour standards inhibit the capacity of enterprises to adapt to changing circumstances and consider them distortions to the free operation of market. Proponents of labour standards argue that sustainable growth and development will not occur without these standards. Still some consider that standards may provoke beneficial effects, but only at advanced levels of economic development, or at times of economic prosperity. Whatever the arguments against labour standards, one should not lose sight of a philosophical underpinning which provide an enabling environment for a typical model of development based on social justice. What is more, Conventions on freedom of association are conducive to growth rather than a constraint and establish basic linkages between human rights, development and change in view of the strong correlation between democracy and development.

The successful conclusions of the Uruguay Round have already set the stage for an ever-more competitive economic environment and will, with the formation of mega trading blocs, undoubtedly reshape the configuration of the world economy. In the wake of the emerging new world trade agreements, there are apprehensions that the new opportunities opening up with major areas of trade are unlikely to benefit substantially the Third World economies that may become isolated and face the added risk of being marginalized if they are not on the political agenda of the developed nations. Faced with the challenge of ensuring that economic growth goes hand in hand with social progress, both the ILO and the new World Trade Organization will have to face the common task of encouraging the promotion of democratic and social reforms for enhancing the market-oriented system.

I must here congratulate the Director-General for his excellent Report, Defending values, promoting change, as it evokes problems raised by the inclusion of a "social clause" in international trade agreements. Initiatives to link international trade and workers' rights with a view to use market access as a lever for improving working conditions have again come to the fore with the signing of the agreement within GATT. Some brand this initiative as ostensible expression of social concern with a view to disguise protectionism. On the other hand advocates of the "social clause" claim that this is simply intended to correct abusive labour practices and that it offers the advantage of improving the lot of workers and of benefiting from increased trade opportunities. The question, is a basic one that lies at the heart of the issue of international trade relations and we should face it dispassionately, within a framework of meaningful dialogue.

I must also recall the bold initiative of the ILO for its involvement with the World Summit for Social Development to be held in 1995. The Summit comes at a time when the third world is deeply concerned with economic gloom, unemployment and indebtedness. Of great concern also is the structural adjustment policies which are putting pressure on the scaling down of budget allocations, which have a direct bearing on health, education and social protection. Moreover, while technological change can improve the life of society, technological innovation can damage society when political and social initiatives fail to keep pace with it. Social responses to the challenge of change differ according to the political, economic, social and cultural structure and the tradition of every society; but the challenge to develop forms of social organization that will maximize benefits and minimize damage is universal. I am therefore strongly convinced that the ILO, with its mandate to promote social justice, can help to develop a world social order that will place more emphasis on the human face of development and thus help to set up a new blueprint for the future.

The Government of Mauritius is committed to the principles embodied in the Constitution of the ILO. Tripartism and social dialogue inspire our policies at various levels of the decision-making process as they enable progress to be developed in partnership, by giving those concerned a say on the decisions that affect their lives. As a contribution to mark the 75th anniversary of the ILO the Government of Mauritius has agreed to ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) and the Labour Statistics Convention, 1985 (No. 160). In addition, my country is updating all its labour laws so as to keep pace with social evolution for the present and future generations. We commit ourselves to ensure constant dialogue with our social partners and progress on guidelines set up by our Organization.

(The speaker continues in French.)

In abiding with the tradition of bilingualism in the Republic of Mauritius, I should like to conclude in French.

I am convinced that we have all come here – and will leave – with a strong commitment to strive even more for the well-being of our peoples in peace, justice and equality. It is my fervent wish that this Conference will be crowned with success.

(Mr. Ould Sidi takes the Chair.)

Mr. AMOAKO (representative of the World Bank) – It is a great pleasure for me to be participating in the International Labour Conference, particularly on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO.

May I start by congratulating the Director-General on a very thoughtful and inspiring report. As you know, this year also marks the 50th anniversary of the World Bank, and as the Director-General rightly notes, an anniversary is both a time for celebration and for reflection – on the achievements and the lessons of the past and on the enormous challenges of the future.

As I read the Director-General's Report, I was struck by the many similarities between the process of re-evaluation of basic objectives which you in the ILO are now undertaking and the World Bank's own internal discussions on its current and future agenda.

Let me just mention a few of these similarities. First, there is the need for organizations such as ours to be able to respond rapidly and flexibly to a changing world and new problems. Then there is the need for enhanced partnerships. The ILO's new policy of "active partnership" parallels in many ways the Bank's increased emphasis on local participation in the design and implementation of projects. There is also the need for greater focus on the implementation of development strategies. The ILO's proposals to develop a kind of "soft law" is quite similar to our own increased attention to the formulation of best practices to guide policy-makers. Finally, there is the need for greater selectivity to avoid setting courses of action and raising expectations out of proportion with available resources.

Yet, despite the extraordinary changes taking place today which are described so vividly in the Director-General's Report, we, like you, have concluded that our basic mandate remains the same.

The ILO's fundamental objective is to promote social justice. The Bank's is to reduce global poverty and improve people's lives.

Over a billion people continue to live in absolute poverty, struggling to survive on a dollar a day. Our estimates suggest that if economic growth is low and recent trends in poverty continue, there could be 200 million more poor people in the developing world by the end of the century. Poverty, therefore, remains our most fundamental challenge.

The strategy that we believe to be most effective in reducing poverty is a simple but powerful one. It has two basic "tracks": labour-intensive economic growth and investment in people.

No country has managed to reduce poverty without economic growth. But the pattern of growth is as important as the rate. Labour-intensive growth allows the poor to make use of their most abundant asset, their labour. It provides jobs and it boosts income.

But this must be accompanied by effective social safety nets. We have found that the poor benefit most from the broad targeting of basic services, such as primary education and health centres, but narrower targeting is also necessary to reach the particularly vulnerable groups: health and nutrition programmes for mother's and infants, feeding programmes for victims of drought or famine; safety nets for the sick and the old.

One may ask – what is the basic, positive role of the labour markets in bringing about employment-generating economic growth and poverty reduction?

An efficient and responsive labour market facilitates economic growth by ensuring that workers are employed in jobs where their skills are most productively utilized and by allowing wages that support a labour-demanding pattern of growth.

Conversely, a distorted and inflexible labour market can be extremely costly, constraining the growth of output and employment and increasing inequality.

The fast-growing economies of East Asia provide one of the best examples of a development strategy which has led to dramatic and sustained growth in labour, incomes and employment. These countries invested heavily and broadly in education and made strategic policy choices that favoured growth in activities which were both efficient and labour-intensive.

This was underpinned by labour market strategies that were pro-employment, but avoided premature protection or excessive wage increases for small groups of the labour force. Outside East Asia, governments in many developing countries have intervened heavily in labour markets, using the legal system, public sector employment and social security programmes to try to influence wages, job security, income stability, and even the level of employment.

Of course, these are all highly desirable objectives, but invariably such interventions affect incentives and behaviour and often lead to unintended negative effects.

In some countries, protectionist labour legislation has led to a small labour elite enjoying high wages, job security and other social security benefits, while employment and real wages outside the protected formal sector have stagnated or declined.

Clearly, we need to be more sensitive to possible trade-offs – improvements in labour standards can increase labour costs and reduce international competitiveness which, in turn, can undermine economic growth and employment creation in the medium term.

At the same time, income security is clearly an important objective. The key is to design measures in a way that does not protect insiders at the expense of outsiders, nor reduces the demand for labour.

Helping countries achieve the right balance between promoting employment and improving income security is, of course, at the heart of the ILO's mandate to promote social justice.

We fully endorse the flexible approach that the ILO has taken in its work on international labour standards – setting benchmarks that countries are expected to adopt when their level of development allows. We are also very pleased to learn that the ILO will devote more resources to research and analysis into the central question of the relationship between regulation, worker protection and employment.

The World Bank's work in the labour market area has gained momentum in recent years.

Traditionally, vocational education and training was at the centre of the Bank's labour-related lending. Of the $600 million of international assistance provided annually for vocational education in the 1980s, the Bank's share was 45 per cent. Most of these projects focused on pre-employment training. However, recent projects are increasingly oriented towards training for the unemployed, rural migrants and small enterprises. One such loan was signed last year with Mexico.

In the 1990s, our poverty assessments, as well as our education sector studies, have begun to pay more attention to the role of labour markets in providing incentives to work and to invest in people. The Bank is also engaged in discussing revision of labour legislation.

Occasionally, there have been structural adjustment loans tied to labour market reforms, such as in Peru in 1991. Moreover, as part of our work on safety nets to help mitigate the social costs of adjustment, we are examining the role of public works in creating temporary employment.

The Bank is also active in the transition economies in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. In these countries, the Bank is supporting "pro-active" labour market policies, such as employment services and training, and "passive" programmes, such as building up the capacity of local agencies to manage unemployment insurance systems. One such loan was signed with Poland in 1991.

Currently, there are a number of labour-related projects in the pipeline in the countries of Eastern Europe, in the East Asia region, including China, and in Africa.

In conclusion, let me repeat the belief that the World Bank's goal to reduce world poverty and the ILO's goal to promote social justice are essentially two sides of the same coin. We must work together to achieve our shared objective.

To reach our objective of sustainable development, the Bank recognizes that governance – that is, the manner in which power is exercised in the management of a country's economic and social resources for development – is an important aspect. We also recognize that labour unions are an important part of the social fabric of democratic countries.

The Bank increasingly discusses issues of mutual interest with labour unions out in the field, most recently in South Africa and the occupied territories.

During the past few years, there have been several meetings between the World Bank and the leaders of international trade unions. I see this Conference, here in Geneva, as another step on the way to more such contacts and exchange of views – all in order to explore ways in which our two institutions can collaborate more effectively to reduce world poverty and to promote social justice.

Mr. KAPARTIS (representative of the International Organization of Employers) – On behalf of the International Organization of Employers, and myself, I wish to convey our congratulations to the President on his election to this high post. We are genuinely pleased to see him in the Chair of this Session of the Conference and are fully confident he will lead its work to a successful conclusion. We wish to congratulate the President most sincerely and, through him, the workers of the world the ILO so honourably represents.

At this early stage of the debate on the Report of the Director-General, it is difficult to anticipate positions delegates may choose to take and the degree of support they may give to the suggestions contained in the Report. What one can easily foresee is that the comments delegates will make will provide a wealth of ideas the ILO cannot afford to ignore. This is not an ordinary debate that can finish in the traditional way with a last-day response from the Director-General. The debate we have started can only be the beginning of a process that aims to revitalize the ILO by redesigning its profile and making it relevant to the expectations of its tripartite constituents and the international community. Too much is at stake to leave decisions in the hands of the executive alone. The policy-making supervisory organs – the International Labour Conference and the Governing Body – have primary responsibility for deciding on appropriate ways that could transform this debate into consensus on what needs to be done to reform the ILO.

Naturally, we welcome the decision of the Director-General to devote his Report on this 75th anniversary to the theme of change. His recognition of the need to change whilst retaining the Organization's fundamental values is the Report's strongest point. There is reality and vision in his Report, alas also utopia and illusion.

Because, how else could one reconcile the Director-General's staunch support of tripartism with his own suggestion that tripartism should be strengthened by the inclusion of other interest groups? This alleged strengthening, this new dimension of tripartism, could only result in diluting the prestige and power of the two non-governmental groups and could dramatically change the uniqueness of our Organization by dealing tripartism a severe, perhaps fatal, blow. For tripartism to be really strengthened, all officials of the ILO must be trained to accept that tripartism is a fact governing their professional lives. The employers can no longer accept being treated as an appendix to the institution.

The references in the Report to the free market, private enterprise and deregulation appear to negate the virtues of the liberalization of international trade. The suggestion that the globalization of the economy has contributed to the widening of inequalities among nations is an unduly pessimistic syllogism and fails to recognize that the liberalization of trade helps many more people than it hurts. The references in the Report to these issues amount to rhetoric based on ideology rather than intellect or empirical evidence.

Subject to my correct understanding of what the Report really says on the social clause, the position of the Director-General is plausible. The ILO cannot alienate itself from the field of its competence nor can it ignore the twin concern for a universal application of basic labour standards and the legitimate search by developing countries for a place in the sun. Very rightly the Director-General explores the different apprehensions of the ILO constituents and points to the need for painful efforts aiming at consensus. It is imperative to strive for consensus, not only among the tripartite constituency but also across the geographical regions and the political groupings. There are many obstacles standing in the way, including suspicions about the real motives behind the proposal for a social clause. And there are many questions surrounding the subject which have remained not only without a reply but even without further investigation. Some of these questions are: Which standards are we talking about? Who establishes failure to apply standards and how? What are the sanctions and which authority is vested with the power to impose them?

Until these questions are properly answered and until consensus is achieved officials of the ILO should be asked to refrain from expressing from official platforms pieces of their own personal intellect.

In the related issue of linkage between international labour standards and technical cooperation, the argument is made in the Report that the links should be strengthened. It sounds quite easy to say that it is therefore natural that technical cooperation should restrict itself to promoting standards, since the latter constitute the objectives of the ILO. But the premise on which the argument is based, that standard setting is the only valid activity of the ILO, is wrong. Standards are only one of the means available to the Organization to achieve the objectives it set for itself in the Declaration of Philadelphia. Some of these objectives, like employment, cannot be achieved through the setting of standards. Only sustainable economic activity can produce jobs, incomes and improved living and working conditions. Technical cooperation cannot be confined to the objective of getting standards ratified or implemented. The world will turn to other multilateral agencies to fill the gap left by the ILO if it withdrew from activities such as employment generation.

The employers recognize the importance of the standard-setting activity but argue that Conventions should be capable of being ratified and applied by as many member States as possible. For this we need flexible texts, not precise prescriptions, which can adapt to the different capabilities of different countries and to the continuously changing overall circumstances in the world. The immediate attention of the Organization should focus on revising old, obsolete instruments rather than continuing with the production of instruments as a matter of course and not out of necessity.

In the case of multinational enterprises, the Report has taken liberties which are unwarranted, both in terms of their contradiction with the wishes of the membership as well as with the realities of the issue. It is saddening to notice in several paragraphs of the Report an unjustified attack on multinationalization and the downplaying of the importance of the ILO's Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. For an Organization which has done so much good work in the study of the social policy of multinational enterprises, it is unbecoming to revive international collective bargaining, a target long fought for in earlier times but eventually abandoned. The ILO's own studies cannot substantiate the assertions made in the relevant pages of the Report. The adding of verification of procedures and the offering of a "social label" award reveal that the Office has chosen the wrong moment to join the critics of multinational enterprises when in the world big and small countries compete to attract foreign investment.

Not everything in the Report is negative – far from it. But I have deliberately chosen to concentrate on some issues that in my opinion need to be looked at critically and corrected. I trust this is also the wish of the Director-General whose task will become less difficult if we all, in our different ways, inform him of our views honestly, of whether we share his vision or not and of the appropriate remedies we wish to apply to the many problems he raises in his Report.

A final remark. Looking on the ILO and carrying the weight of commitment and of old values is undoubtedly our duty and especially so of the Director-General. But it is not enough. Unquestionably, we also have to look outside and free ourselves from the certainties which daunt us, allowing our doubts to lead us to solutions that respond to the expectations of the tripartite constituency of the ILO and of the world that has dramatically changed. The Employers' group offers itself uncommittedly to an open dialogue and is ready to accept that there are legitimate views and positions other than its own. It expects nothing less from the governments, the workers and, above all, from the Office.

Original Spanish: Mr. ARRATE MAC NIVEN (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Chile) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election to the chair of this Conference. It is important to emphasize that a very great responsibility has thus fallen to a representative of the workers.

I should also like to say that the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO is a source of considerable satisfaction for my country. The past three-quarters of a century have demonstrated the value of an institution that has made a decisive contribution to progress in our societies and in the world of work at a time in history marked by many far-reaching changes.

The Government of Chile, which has served on the Governing Board since last year, is interested in becoming actively involved in the tasks and challenges that the ILO has set itself for the future.

I therefore wish to refer in particular to the Director-General's Report, whose title Defending values, promoting change we find stimulating inasmuch as it reflects, in more than one sense, what we have sought to achieve in Chile in the period of democracy.

We have taken decisive steps towards combining democratic values and social justice with the task of bringing about the economic, social and institutional changes that modern development demands.

We are convinced that it is only by rigorously preserving these values that the changes required for modernization can be introduced on a solid and sustainable basis. To that end, we are making every effort to ensure that economic growth is a source of greater equity and that democratic and participatory institutions serve as effective instruments for achieving the requisite social and political consensus.

As the Director-General notes, we are undoubtedly living in a world that is undergoing major changes, a situation that also provides the opportunity for progress in identifying the type of adjustments that must be made in many areas related to the world of work.

Nothing would be more risky than to imagine that the uncertainty associated with economic, social, political and technological change can be met with immobility or the seeking of refuge in structures that have now become obsolete. To overcome such uncertainty, society as a whole and, in the field of labour, employees, employers and governments through tripartite or bipartite bodies must set in motion a process of innovation.

Social dialogue is an effective means of taking up this challenge of creativity and innovation in a democratic way. Social dialogue is a way of avoiding technocratic or authoritarian temptations and ensures that all constituents of society can assist in specifying and working out the necessary solutions.

As mentioned by the Director-General in Chapter 3 of his Report, the field of labour standards is particularly sensitive to the new economic circumstances and to technological change. The necessary adjustments must certainly be considered carefully and in depth to ensure that the results are consistent with job creation and continuous enhancement of the quality of jobs, as well as with the dignity of workers and their role in economic life.

In our country we are in the process of improving our labour institutions to bring them into line with the requirements of an economy that is open to international competition and to market conditions involving high factor mobility. But we must at the same time consider the new forms of protection and regulation that are required to ensure equitable labour relations under the new circumstances.

We intend to reform our national vocational training system, introducing ideas and tools that make it capable of tackling, in coordination with the private sector, such vital tasks as retraining in connection with the restructuring of outdated branches of production, easier access for young people and women to the labour market and, in particular, effective use of training resources by small-scale enterprises.

The country's unemployment rate is now running at about 5 per cent, which is a considerable achievement. But at the same time it is essential to improve the quality of the jobs being offered, many of which are still rated low in terms of productivity and are badly paid.

In connection with the foregoing, we are implementing a programme of modernization of our systems of job placement and counselling at the municipal level.

We are also making headway in studies of a system of income protection for workers who are unemployed as a result of disputes, an instrument which, together with those already mentioned, will constitute a comprehensive system of policies to meet the challenges of higher productivity, better quality and protection of workers in the processes of economic and technological change associated with an economy open to international competition.

Our labour policy also assigns high priority to legal supervision of compliance with labour laws and regulations. We are convinced that the role of the public institutions responsible for such supervision is of the greatest importance and should be carried out with the necessary rigour. There is no point in modernizing labour institutions if legislation is not complied with or its spirit is wilfully misinterpreted. Violations or circumventions of the law make workers suspicious of change so that they tend to take up defensive positions that may impede the desired modernization. It also creates unfair competition between enterprises and undermines the credibility of the entire system of labour relations.

An element of our present policy is to carry out a programme of equal opportunities for women in the labour world, and this covers not only the legislative aspects of equal opportunity, but also the issues of conditions of work and equal remuneration, among others.

We are also involved in trying to solve the problems of effective access to social security cover for the new categories of workers which are beginning to emerge, such as casual or seasonal workers, especially in the agricultural exports sector, as well as in others. In the area of social security we are taking steps to improve the situation of senior citizens, the majority of whom in Chile are still in a very precarious situation.

I would also like to draw attention to the fact that we intend to design an ambitious programme which will make it possible to have access, both quantitatively and qualitatively, for workers and their families to participatory and creative activities of a cultural and recreational nature. This is a sphere which is very closely linked with the dignity of work and its recognition as an essential element of human development.

Lastly, our policy aims to create the largest possible number of areas and bodies to participate in the development of these plans. We are convinced that dialogue, regular consultation and negotiation are fundamental in order to progress towards all the objectives which we are aiming to achieve.

For the above reasons, I repeat that the subjects which have been proposed by the Director-General demand an effort from us all and from the ILO itself, in order to strengthen and promote the mechanisms for social dialogue. Without this process the changes which are so urgently needed in so many areas would probably result in conflicts which could otherwise be avoided. It is not an easy road to take, but it is certainly the most effective one in the long run.

Mr. DATO'LIM (Minister of Human Resources, Malaysia) – I would like, first of all, on behalf of the Malaysian delegation to congratulate the President on his election. The election of a Worker representative as President of this assembly on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO is indeed a fitting tribute to the important role played by workers in the ILO's efforts to promote development and social justice. We welcome his election, and I am confident that, under his capable leadership the proceedings of this Conference will be steered to a successful conclusion. Similarly, I would also like to offer my congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents on their election by the Conference.

The 81st Session provides a special occasion for us to warmly welcome back the Republic of South Africa as a member of our Organization. The historic election held recently in South Africa has finally put an end to the evil practice of apartheid, and ushered in a truly democratic and non-racial government which will augur well for the future development of the South African people.

This is an important year for all of us, as the ILO celebrates its 75th anniversary. I wish to take this opportunity to extend Malaysia's warmest congratulations and best wishes for the continued success of the ILO. The 75th anniversary will be an occasion not only to celebrate the past achievements of the ILO but also to chart its future direction. We have come a long way since 1919, but much more remains to be done to correct some of the structural imbalances within the ILO, as well as the social injustices prevailing in many parts of the world today.

In Bosnia and Herzegovina, unchecked genocide is taking place before our very eyes but the international community has not been able to do anything much to stop the Serb aggression. The ministerial meeting of the non-aligned countries held recently in Cairo supported Malaysia's proposal calling for an international conference to resolve this human tragedy. We call upon the ILO, on the occasion of its 75th anniversary, to support more positive international action to restore social justice to the people in Bosnia and Herzegovina and bring about lasting peace in the region.

During the last seven decades or so, ILO's broad mandate has been aimed at homogenizing labour practices across competing economies, blunting the social unrest and promoting social justice. Since the ILO's foundation, the "western voice" has tended to dominate the Organization's policy-making body and to control the top positions which have been reserved for the ten principal "industrial states". Even after the entry of many Asian and African nations in the 1950's and 1960's, ILO's representative structure and its standard-setting activities have remained unchanged, and are largely based on western-European norms and standards. There is now a need for reforms to be undertaken in the ILO's representative structure, and for policies to be developed that are less rigid and more in line with the realities and aspirations of the larger proportion of the world community. The challenges facing the ILO will be many as we usher in the new era that follows conclusion of the Uruguay Round. It will be characterized by keener international competition for capital and markets. This will affect the developing countries – and more especially the least-developed countries which are faced with unemployment and a host of economic, social and political problems. The question, therefore, is how the ILO can help in resolving some of these structural problems, and yet be able to make its standard-setting activities relevant to the changing demands of the time. This is particularly so when standards themselves do not guarantee that jobs will be found for the millions of unemployed or solve the structural adjustment problems. Under the circumstances, will it help if a new conditionality is imposed by linking the social clause with market access and free trade? It would certainly be ill conceived – particularly when the labour standards which some developed countries are attempting to impose are the very cause of their own economic malaise.

Even in some developed countries, there is today a reconsideration of the welfare state; and it is believed that the inflexibility of the labour market in western countries is due partly to these rigid ILO standards. Having created difficulties for themselves, some developed countries are trying to export these very rigid ILO standards to the developing countries to erode their competitiveness.

They now want us to conform to these standards in order to enjoy free trade. We view this new conditionality with much concern. It will only stifle trade and economic development and make it more difficult for the developing countries to increase their resources to overcome their structural adjustment problems and increase the living standards of their people.

It is appreciated that the advocates of the social clause have the interest of workers at heart and, on this, let me state categorically that the Malaysian Government shares the same commitment to raising the living standards of our people and constantly improving the welfare of our workers. I wish to reiterate that Malaysia is not opposed to labour standards, but the rigid manner in which they are likely to be imposed on the developing countries on the basis of equality, i.e. on a level playing field, and on the basis of norms and values of developed countries. This is unfair when developing countries are already handicapped by the lack of technology and capital, and have only their competitive labour and low cost-of-living as their comparative advantages. A large number of these standards were formulated, when many developing countries were still colonies of western powers, to meet the needs of an earlier phase of industrialization and development. Such standards do not reflect social and economic conditions in these countries, and this may explain why many countries are reluctant to ratify the ILO Conventions and why they encounter great difficulty in complying with those Conventions they have ratified.

It is in the light of these developments that the ASEAN countries of Indonesia, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Malaysia have tabled a resolution calling on the ILO to resist the introduction of a social clause into international trade and to review ILO standards. The ILO, on the occasion of its 75th anniversary, must deal with this issue fairly and courageously so that the priorities of our Organization can be set on the right track for promoting the social development that we all desire to achieve without unfair conditionality and rigid labour standards. It is our hope that the resolution will gain the full support of our august assembly.

I wish to take this opportunity to thank the Director-General for his thought-provoking Report entitled Defending Values, Promoting Change wherein he has stressed the need to rethink and reorient the ILO's main tasks. In this regard, I would urge the ILO to look at labour market flexibility and human resources development as key elements in its programme of work in the coming decades. As the ILO charts its future work programme on the occasion of its 75th anniversary, it must place greater emphasis on human resources development. Our human resources are valuable assets which must be nurtured by a caring culture and prudent human resource development strategies. The quality of our workforce is a prerequisite to sustainable development and competitiveness. I hope that the ILO will be able to do more in this field to fulfil one of its responsibilities in enriching human development, so that it can be included as one of its recommendations to the World Summit on Social Development in 1995.

Mr. KIDD (Minister of Labour, New Zealand) – I would like to offer my congratulations to the President on his election to preside over the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference in this most significant of years, the 75th anniversary of the Organization.

New Zealand has been an active Member of the ILO for all those 75 years. It is noteworthy that the President of the 1944 Session of the Conference, which adopted the Declaration of Philadelphia, was a New Zealander, later to become Sir Walter Nash, and Prime Minister of our country. Our current Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Jim Bolger, was President of the Conference in 1983. As President, he urged a review of the role and functions of the ILO, believing at that time it was in need of reform. The discussion now being initiated is not so much timely as overdue, but welcome nonetheless.

Our recent experiences in the ILO have demonstrated clearly to us the need for review. I refer to the treatment of a complaint made by the New Zealand unions against the Government's Employment Contracts Act, which I will hereafter refer to as "the Act".

The Freedom of Association Committee's Interim Report was critical of a number of issues in our industrial relations legislation. One was a lack of consultation prior to our Act becoming law.

In the 1990 election, my party campaigned strongly on a platform of economic reform, a central part of which consisted of what was to become the Act. Every component of the proposed industrial relations environment was spelt out well before the election. We achieved the biggest political turnaround in New Zealand's modern history, giving us two-thirds of the seats in our Parliament.

It is almost impossible to have a stronger mandate from the people than we received in 1990.

Criticism was also made on the issue of freedom of association. Amongst the great treasures of New Zealand is our inheritance of the common law of England. It gives precedence to the rights of the individual.

New Zealand and the ILO appear to have significant differences regarding the rights of the individual.

For the ILO to appear to support a special legal status for unions, as opposed to the rights of the individual, suggests a different underlying philosophy. Every New Zealander is absolutely free to join, not join or leave a union. Anyone can form a union. The same holds true for employers with respect to their organizations.

The ILO appears to believe that only collective bargaining will work. In New Zealand, collective bargaining is accepted. Union representation is accepted. But these are only two of many options. The ILO has yet to recognize that our Act gives employees wider rights of representation and greater freedom of association and legal protections than New Zealand's previous industrial law.

The ILO has assumed that employers are able to bypass authorized union representatives. That is wrong. The only way it was able to come to such a view was through its procedural inability to receive and consider a November 1993 judgement of the independent New Zealand Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal expressed the view that our Employment Contracts Act both protects the rights of workers and is consistent with ILO Conventions.

This experience of ILO procedures at work demonstrates clearly that they are in need of urgent reform.

The Committee's comments on collective bargaining are also uninformed. Fifty-nine per cent of employees covered by contracts negotiated under the Act have collective contracts. Of all employees covered by collective contracts, 77 per cent were represented by a union. One could ask what all the fuss was about. It points to the political nature of the complaint. The ILO has regrettably been drawn into a live domestic political issue.

The ILO has asked to send a contact mission to New Zealand to examine our system. They will be welcome. They will be surrounded by vigorous debate as befits an open democratic society.

A few years ago, New Zealand's economy was in a crisis, with the lowest economic growth in the OECD; investment and business confidence at an all-time low; unsustainable and growing debt; soaring unemployment.

In the three years that the Act has been in place, the turnaround has been dramatic.

Last year our growth rate was 4.6 per cent. The outlook is for strong growth.

Investment has reached record levels. Inflation is currently at an annual rate of 1.3 per cent. Our performance compares more than favourably alongside other OECD nations.

The progress achieved under the Act has not been at the expense of employee protections. It has widened and strengthened them. For the first time in New Zealand's labour history, all employees now enjoy access to the specialist labour institutions and to personal grievance and dispute resolutions procedures.

We have strengthened our laws relating to health and safety in the workplace.

We have introduced a minimum youth wage to partner our long-established minimum adult wage.

Some of the best news of this recovery is the improvement in employment figures. For the year to March 1994 New Zealand experienced a 3.9 per cent increase in job growth. This is 57,000 more jobs for New Zealanders. In the two years to March 1994, unemployment fell from 10.7 per cent to 9.1 per cent. We are determined to do even better.

The Act has facilitated higher productivity, more flexibility in the workplace and greater international competitiveness. The Act has not alone been responble for these achievements, but without it they ould not have been possible.

The liberalization of our domestic labour market as put New Zealand in a far stronger position to ompete in the global economy.

I turn now to the current debate about the ques- on of a linkage between trade and labour standards hich features in the Director-General's Report to he Conference. We think it is appropriate for the LO to review and update those Conventions which ontain fundamental standards as well as to streng- hen the process for encouraging widespread adher- nce to them. Such initial work must provide the tarting point for the discussion, before we even be- in to talk about trade.

We must all defend the achievements of the Uru- uay Round against attempts to introduce new pro- ectionist mechanisms. New Zealand worked long nd hard in the negotiations with our Cairns Group artners to bring about fundamental changes in the ules of international trade. One of the basic reasons e worked for freer trade and less protection is be- ause we believe that at the national and inter- ational level an unsuccessful economy cannot se- ure social justice.

It is vital for a body celebrating its 75th anniver- ary that it look forward and not back. The ILO can nd must be a force for good. To remain relevant, it nust continue to adapt, not only in reviewing the ype of standards it promotes, but also in its working nethods.

The New Zealand Government believes that con- tant adaptation to the real world is the path to fol- ow to provide social and economic justice to New ealanders. We commend the same practical ap- roach to the ILO as it plans for its future. Thank ou very much.

Original Arabic: Mr. OULD ABDI (Minister of abour, the Civil Service, Youth and Sports, Maur- ania) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Com- assionate! May I first of all congratulate the Presi- ent on behalf of my country – the Islamic Republic f Mauritania – on his election to the presidency of his session. I would also like to congratulate his ountry, with which we maintain very fraternal and iendly relations.

I am certain that thanks to his experience and skill he work of this session will be successful. I would gain like to thank the Conference for having elected o the post of Vice-President one of my countrymen. This is a great honour for my country and for my eople and we thank you. I would also like to ad- lress my thanks to the Director-General and every- ne in the Office for all the efforts they have made in reparation for this session. Finally, I would like to xpress a warm welcome to all the new Members of his session of the Conference.

This session of the Conference is of particular importance, as we are now celebrating the 75th anniversary of the founding of the Organization as well as the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia which further defined the objectives of this Organization.

The Director-General, in his very exhaustive Report, has made a complete listing of the activities of the Organization and of the prospects for its future activities.

In Mauritania, we have given great importance to the principle of social justice in the broadest sense. This is not only an objective, it is also a means. Indeed, since we joined the Organization following the attainment of independence in 1961 we have been promoting the principles of social justice by passing laws and ratifying all the international conventions that support it.

Permanent consultation of the social partners is, for us, a basic principle which is strengthened by trade union pluralism and has become part of our country's everyday life.

I would like to thank the International Labour Office which has helped us to revise the labour law in our country. We have now achieved several results, including the separation of employment bureaus and the labour law enforcement service, the drafting of child labour standards and health and safety standards. We are also following very closely the implementation of a multidisciplinary vocational training programme in all regions of the country.

The experience of democracy in Mauritania, supported by the President of the Republic, has made it possible to institute a climate of social justice in our country. We have democratic institutions in our country and all citizens are able to exercise their rights; they are able to defend these rights themselves.

My country would like the international community to look into the restructuring of the world's economy in order to strike a better balance between the State, the market and civil society in nation States in the name of social justice, which was mentioned with such sincerity by the Director-General of the Office.

We are following very closely and with much hope the positive consequences of self-determination for the Palestinian people and the consequences it might have for Palestinian workers. We are also pleased to note the positive transformations which have taken place in South Africa and the consequent improvement of the condition of workers in that country.

We would also like the international community to look into the situation of workers in Bosnia and Herzegovina and to work to relieve their suffering.

President: Mr Mendoza

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MENDOZA) – We shall now continue the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Mr. MASINDE (Minister for Labour and Manpower Development, Kenya) – On behalf of the Kenyan delegation please allow me to take this opportunity to congratulate the President together with the other Officers of the Conference most sincerely on their election to guide the deliberations of this session of the International Labour Conference.

My delegation has noted that the Report of the Director-General for this year's session of the Conference consists of two parts. Part I of the Report covers in great detail the "central theme" for this year's session of the Conference, that is the topic entitled Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda, while Part II of the Report contains an account of the ILO activities for the previous year.

In my delegation's view, the theme for our discussion during this year's session of the Conference is particularly relevant as the ILO celebrates the 75th anniversary of its existence. This Organization was founded in 1919 in order to advance the cause of social and economic justice everywhere in the world. This must include the promotion and constant defence of such important values and ideals as respect for fundamental human rights, decent living standards, humane working conditions, employment opportunities, economic security to ensure universal and lasting peace. It was also created in order to set international minimum labour standards for workers' protection and provide for a body of knowledge of the world's labour problems. This is clearly stipulated in the 1944 Declaration of Philadelphia which is an annexe to the ILO Constitution and has remained a guiding consideration in all ILO work.

The ILO is set to celebrate its 75th anniversary this year against a background of very fundamental changes that have taken place during recent times throughout the world. These changes have fundamentally affected the environment within which the ILO operates. It has witnessed the disappearance of the former communist bloc and hence the end of the east-west confrontation, the triumph of the market economy following the collapse of communism in Eastern Europe, the globalization of the world's economy and a worldwide trend towards democracy.

As we congratulate the ILO today during its 75th anniversary, it should be a time for the ILO under its Constitution's mandate to help the member States to grow under the rule of law and be guaranteed enjoyment of basic human rights in general, and for workers in particular, preparing them to play an effective role in economic and social development. As the Director-General clearly points out in his Report: "It is a time for our Organization, motivated today as in the past by the ideal of social justice, to show, with the help of its tripartite membership, that this ideal means something only if it leaves its stamp on reality." It is also true, as the Director-General points out, that as we celebrate the 75th anniversary of our noble Organization it is an opportunity for the international community to reaffirm its belief in social justice as one of its fundamental values, its determination to further this cause, its confidence in active tripartism as a moving force, and its determination to adapt the Organization and its secretariat to the tasks that lie ahead.

Kenya became a Member of the ILO in 1964 by accepting the obligations of the Organization's Constitution. We became Members because we were willing to be guided by the values and ideals as enshrined in the Constitution of this Organization – that is, respect for human rights and social justice as attained through democratic processes. In this respect, I wish to state that Kenya is a democratic country where the rule of law, the independence of the judiciary and freedom of association prevail. The Kenyan delegation notes with satisfaction that the ILO is set to mark its 75th anniversary this year in a spirit of genuine renewal and modernization parallel to a reaffirmation of commitment to the principles which remain relevant to the evolving world of work. In this respect, the Organization should continue to do fewer things but do them better especially in those areas where the Organization has a comparative advantage over other United Nations agencies. In the view of the Kenyan delegation such priority areas should include: promoting the advancement of democracy through the rule of law; tripartism and sound industrial relations practices; social justice, freedom of association, economic security and equal opportunity for all; the fight against poverty by developing responsive training systems, employment-creation schemes and social institutions, and ensuring that restructuring policies take full account of social needs.

The protection of the working people and of the working environment in the world of work today is another "core" mandate area for the ILO. The working conditions and the working environment in many parts of the world today can only be described as alarming for it is no secret that the lives, health and welfare of millions of workers are at stake during each moment of the working day. It is therefore necessary for the ILO to renew its efforts in this important area of operation.

Another problem that I wish to highlight is that of child labour. Although it is now 75 years since the ILO adopted the Minimum Age (Industry) Convention (No. 5) in 1919 child labour still remains a pressing problem in much of the world today. Its eventual abolition should, therefore, still remain a key priority area for action by the ILO. Another area where the ILO has made some substantial progress is the promotion of equal opportunities and treatment for men and women. This should continue to be a priority area in the ILO's plan of action. Kenya continues to recognize the fact that training plays a vital role in its development process, and it is in this respect that we would like to urge the ILO to continue to allocate more resources for training activities in such vital regional training institutions as the African Regional Labour Administration Centre in Harare and others.

The Kenya delegation would like to thank the ILO Director-General for having initiated the various major programmes and changes within our Organization since all such changes are aimed at enhancing the capacity of our Organization to improve upon its services to the member States which have grown from 45 in 1919 to 171 countries now.

The Kenya delegation also wishes to mention that as we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the existence of the ILO, it should be reaffirmed that social justice is neither a luxury nor a palliative for the poor, but the essence of civilized community. It must inspire all political choices, as the world – and within it the ILO – renovates the past and builds the future.

The Kenya delegation would like to join other leaders from the entire free world in sincerely congratulating President Nelson Mandela and his African National Congress for their many years of protracted struggle which brought an end to the evil apartheid regime – and also brought about the beginning of a new democratic South Africa.

Finally, and in view of the important role played by the ILO in world affairs in general, and advancement of social and economic justice in particular, the Kenya Government will always be prepared to give it moral and material support within her limited resources. I therefore take this opportunity to call upon all the ILO member States to support this worthy Organization wholeheartedly in its noble tasks for the benefit of all mankind as we enter the twenty-first century.

Mr. KANG (Vice-Minister, Ministry of Labour, Republic of Korea) – It is a great honour for me to represent the Government of the Republic of Korea at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, which marks the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

I would like to begin by paying tribute to the Director-General, Michel Hansenne, for his admirable Report to this Conference entitled Defending values, promoting change. In the Report, the Director-General makes the point that the launching of the World Trade Organization and the accelerating globalization of the world economy has made it important and inevitable that the ILO should once again seriously deliberate improving labour conditions in order to enhance the quality of human life and to promote social justice. I completely agree with him.

I believe that the launching of the World Trade Organization, as well as the globalization of the world economy, may indeed eventually increase employment opportunities and the income of the world's labour force by bringing down barriers to international trade and investment. But I also believe that this process is bound to involve changes in the structure of employment as well as in labour-management relations.

The rapid changes in industrial structure that result from trade liberalization and technological progress pose serious challenges to workers in both developed and developing countries. I believe that the common core of these problems, faced by the workers around the world, is the lack of adequate lifelong education and job training.

Today, economic change is being led by entrepreneurs, while the educational system remains in the hands of governments. As a result, education hopelessly lags behind management and technological innovations. Entrepreneurs actively seek investment in labour-saving innovations but not in the training of workers for adaptation to new technologies.

Multinational corporations, which are at the forefront of the current globalization drive, are also not encouraged to provide workers in developing countries with vocational training in high technology skills. For this reason, I would like to propose that the ILO develop an instrument that would encourage multinational corporations and other global firms to expand technical education and vocational training for their workers.

Furthermore, I would like to propose that the World Summit for Social Development to be held in 1995 address the issues of how to assist national governments in reforming education and how to encourage multinational firms to expand vocational training for their employees.

In addition, I believe that the ILO should pay greater attention to the fact that in developing countries many workers lose their ability to work as a result of industrial accidents. I feel that it is primarily the responsibility of the respective governments and firms to improve industrial safety in the developing countries. However, on the global level, technical assistance by the developed countries should play an important role.

The Republic of Korea joined the ILO in December 1991. However, the Korean Government firmly believes in the moral value of the international labour standards that this Organization has developed over the last 75 years.

Today, like many other governments around the world, the Korean Government is engaged in deregulation in order to encourage entrepreneurs and workers to be more creative and competitive. I would like to give my full support to the Director-General's suggestion that the ILO consolidate similar international labour standards and allow more flexible utilization of instruments and recommendations.

Let me now turn to the issue of linkage between international trade and labour standards, discussion of which has been expanded since the Ministerial Declaration at Marrakesh in April of this year. The Director-General proposed that the implementation of social clauses should not be enforced but should be encouraged through persuasion and cooperation.

To some extent his view recognizes that developing countries have a legitimate complaint when they state they have trouble accepting labour standards that are as high as those in developed countries. I am sympathetic to these complaints.

However, it is also my belief that the developing countries, too, should more actively seek to abolish labour practices which infringe on basic human rights such as child and forced labour. Furthermore, I believe that they should at least institutionally guarantee fundamental labour rights, i.e. the right to organization and the right to collective bargaining.

My thoughts on the issue of a linkage between international trade and national labour practices add up to the point that, if there is going to be harmony, it should be a harmony that reconciles the different interests of countries at various levels of economic and political development.

One important point to remember when discussing the linkage of labour practices and international trade is that the social justice that the ILO pursues is not for the workers of a few countries but for the workers of all countries.

The world has survived the Cold War and the conflict of ideologies, but has entered an era of relentless change and fierce economic competition. In this new era, everyone is adapting and trying to change in order to adjust to the new realities that change brings. Governments, companies, trade unions and even workers themselves must all be ready to change and grow together for a brighter future.

As far as governments are concerned, they all have to change in the same direction, towards deregulation by allowing free competition in the marketplace and by encouraging workers to be more creative. Deregulation is undoubtedly appropriate in the case of many complex labour-related regulations which were developed in the past in order to settle disputes by legal force rather than by private contact and self-rule. I recommend that the ILO continue to play an active role in helping to facilitate these changes in the best interests of all participating member nations.

In closing, I would like to assure you that the Republic of Korea will be playing an active role in the upholding of social justice through the ILO and that we want to play a unique and constructive role in the ILO as an intermediary between the developed and the developing countries.

I wish the best of luck to all in the challenges that lie ahead.

Mr. SPETH (Administrator, United Nations Development Programme) – It is truly an honour and a pleasure for me to address this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, in which we are commemorating the 75th anniversary of the ILO. We at the UNDP would like to extend our warmest congratulations and our best wishes for success in years to come. We commend the ILO for its exemplary work in the field of international standard setting and in assisting countries in their efforts to meet those standards in employment and development and in training.

Today, the UNDP visualizes the role of the ILO in the international community as more vitally important than ever. With its tripartite composition, the ILO is uniquely placed to lead the massive effort needed to deal with the growing global problems associated with massive underemployment and unemployment, the world famine of jobs. The phenomenon is endemic, not only in developing countries but in the developed world as well, with "open" unemployment averaging about 8 per cent in many industrialized countries, and higher in many others. Economies in transition face special problems, with growing unemployment often linked to privatization and market reforms, hopefully temporary. Poverty, social disintegration and environmental deterioration are inexplicably linked to underemployment and unemployment. The statements that preceded my own at this Conference attest to that.

The new global challenges will widen the ILO's scope of activity. I would like to emphasize, in particular, the pervasive effect on international migration and on the related issue of social integration. This is an area where the UNDP and the ILO will collaborate in joint activities in programme countries, and as part of our collaboration in the preparations for the World Summit for Social Development.

Another relatively new factor is the high rate of population growth in many countries, including those in which more than half the population is currently below the age of 15 and has yet to enter the workforce. Nowhere is this a more critical problem than on the continent of Africa, a region where the ILO has predicted that the youth age group – i.e. 15 to 24 years of age – will continue to expand for at least 30 years.

The ILO's biennial Report on African Employment that stated in 1992 almost 6 million young Africans entered the labour force each year. This is in addition to an already unacceptably high structural unemployment and backlogs of unemployed, particularly those in urban regions.

This week, the UNDP Executive Board is meeting in another part of this famous building, looking to our future, planning the role of the UNDP in the years ahead. One of the most important elements attached to the UNDP's future role is the need to re-emphasize the substantive partnerships the UNDP has within the United Nations family, and including the partnership with the ILO.

Employment generation, and the components needed to create and maintain it, is one of the four pillars of what we at the UNDP see as a new paradigm – the paradigm of sustainable human development; development that not only generates growth but distributes its benefits equitably; that regenerates the environment instead of destroying it; that empowers people rather than marginalizing them. It is development that gives priority to the poor, enlarging their choices and opportunities, including their job opportunities, and provides for their participation in the decisions that affect their lives.

Sustainable human development, in a nutshell, can be said to be pro-poor, pro-nature, pro-jobs and pro-women. It is a unifying concept for all the development work of the United Nations.

The ILO has a key role to play with the UNDP in providing substantive guidance, in interpreting sustainable human development into practical initiatives at the country level. We can and we must work together on the creation of jobs and sustainable livelihoods for the world's poor. We can promote, and we must promote, job-led growth, not job-less growth.

Among the priorities the UNDP foresees for its partnership with the ILO in technical cooperation are: equitable employment generation and the continued productive integration of women into the workforce. To this end, the UNDP and the ILO have set up a task force and entrusted it with the task of rebuilding a substantive partnership and identifying new initiatives for future cooperation. Moreover the UNDP and the ILO will cooperate in implementing the United Nations Secretary-General's recently published Agenda for Development and, very importantly, in pursuing the processes related to the World Summit for Social Development and its follow-up.

I would, at this juncture like to underline that the UNDP, while developing some expertise in the field of job-creation strategies, cannot and does not intend to duplicate the work of the ILO, or its expertise. What we want is enough UNDP capacity to be good partners with you, and good supporters of you.

What the UNDP can do is: provide resources; work with governments and our development partners to identify needs and develop strategies; and assist in capacity-building towards those ends.

The UNDP 1994 Human Development Report, which was released just last week, elaborates the central elements for an effective national employment strategy as likely to include: education and skills, an enabling environment, access to assets, labour-intensive technologies, public works programmes, attention to disadvantaged groups, and the development of more innovative and flexible working arrangements wherever possible.

These elements will be high on the agenda of the World Summit for Social Development, an event we are all anticipating with great hope and expectation. The Social Summit will focus the attention of national leaders on the critical links among poverty and employment and social integration and call for new and more workable strategies. We look forward to forging new North-South partnerships and to providing inputs to this Social Summit.

In connection with the Summit, the UNDP is currently supporting the ILO's research on relationships between economic policy and employment, and on patterns and causes of social exclusion. Our two organizations are also exploring further collaboration in examining international policy options for creating more jobs. These are critical questions for the Summit – critical questions for our common future. We must find ways to reduce joblessness. We must reopen the door to innovative and creative thinking on the fundamental concepts underlying what has been called "labour market behaviour". This means re-examining time-honoured precepts such as "employment", "occupation" and "livelihood", as well as the statistical estimates of these key parameters of human endeavour. We share with the ILO its total commitment to the strengthening of the social dimension and to improving the service of the United Nations system. We look forward to firm friendship and cooperation in the future and to sharing in a continuing quest, as Mr. Hansenne has summarized the preamble to the Constitution of the ILO in his own words, to "contribute to universal and lasting peace through the promotion and development of social justice".

Mr. ABOOSALLY (Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Sri Lanka) – Let me at the outset convey to the President my felicitations on his election to such a great office. I bring cordial greetings from the President of Sri Lanka, the Prime Minister and our people. For my part it gives me great pleasure as the leader of the Sri Lanka delegation to participate in this the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. This is a special occasion for me personally as this is the first such Conference I am attending in the capacity of Minister of Labour and Vocational Training of my country. At the same time I am aware that this Conference is taking place on an auspicious and unique occasion – the celebration of the ILO's 75th anniversary. Therefore my delegation joins hands with all the others in extending our heartiest congratulations and wishing the ILO many more years of service to the international community.

This achievement, which has made it the oldest existing international organization in the world, is a shining testament to its illustrious career and its enduring contribution to the world which has earned it respect and approbation from age to age. At this time of worldwide fluctuation when hallowed values and institutions are being challenged, the ILO is a reassuring example of durability and resilience.

Before turning to the Report of the Director-General of the ILO which is the key item on our agenda, I wish to refer to the item entitled Review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. You will agree that this item has now been made redundant by the epoch-making events in South Africa where we have witnessed not only the dismantling of the abhorrent system of apartheid but also the forging of a partnership between bitter adversaries in the interests of a unified South Africa.

This is a triumph of light over darkness, or enlightened statesmanship over narrow nationalism, ethnicity and prejudice. It should be a beacon of hope to other peoples and societies struggling against these evils.

The keynote of the Director-General's Report is the recent changes on the international economic stage and the need for the ILO to adjust its perspectives and strategies accordingly. These changes are primarily the globalization of the world economy which has caused recession and problems of unemployment in both the developed and developing countries, and the resultant burdens of structural adjustments incurred by countries, which have caused social distress and economic dislocation. It has brought the issue of the social dimension to the forefront of the international community and calls for a reorientation in the policies and strategies for development of international organizations.

As far as the ILO is concerned, it means a return to its roots in the Declaration of Philadelphia where its mandate is defined, inter alia, as a responsibility to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of the fundamental objective of social justice. This means that the ILO can no longer confine itself to its traditional role of standard-setter and promoter of labour welfare and relations. Instead it has to emerge boldly onto the battlefield and live up to the original role envisaged for it as a fighter for the cause of social justice. This does not mean the exhaustion of its statutory mandate but that the wider imperatives of social justice in the world have caught up with it and demand that it play a global role.

It is significant that this is also the conclusion of the working group appointed by the Governing Body of the ILO to report on the structure of the ILO. Section 56 of the Memorandum highlights the wide ranging mandate of the ILO, embracing as it does social justice, human rights, the pursuit of material and spiritual wellbeing, economic security and equal opportunity. The purposes of the ILO encapsulate some of the socio-economic and humanistic provisions of the United Nations Charter itself. This role has become even more urgent in the context of the diminishing ability of the State to control globalism, the internal erosion of the State itself as the instrument of the international community, and the decline of economic aid on which the post-war world had pinned its hopes as the medium through which the economic chasms in the world may be bridged in the spirit of the United Nations Charter. This will not be an easy dimensional leap for the ILO constituted as it is at present. The Director-General has admitted this but he has already taken significant preparatory steps such as contacts with international credit institutions.

The decisions as regards the future role of the ILO will be taken at the forthcoming World Summit for Social Development scheduled for 1995. It is our hope that these will be ones which, recognizing the invaluable services and potential of the ILO, will open the way for it to reach out for new horizons and take its due place in the world at large.

At the same time I must submit that the attainment of social justice alone is no longer sufficient, because today mankind itself is in peril when we see the sickening carnage occurring throughout the world with human beings reduced to piles of corpses, causing one to exclaim like Mark Anthony "O judgement! Thou art fled to brutish beasts, and men have lost their reason". Social justice should therefore be regarded not only as a means of harmonizing class divisions but of restoring the spark of humanity in men in a way which would bring them together within their respective societies, shaking off legacies of hatred or fanatical addictions to narrow nationalism.

It is here that the noble example set by South Africa should be a guiding light. This is an area where up to now the United Nations has been unable to make a decisive contribution, but it is felt that the ILO with its experience of promoting harmony through tripartism should be able to render a useful service in this regard. Of what use social development when the fabric of society itself is rent asunder and the need of the hour is to save society itself?

While indulging in these lofty visions of the future role of the ILO it is not inappropriate to look closer to home to its role in the region and in my country. I will of course raise these matters at our ministerial sessions in the company of my distinguished colleagues but here suffice it to say that our relationship with the ILO has been exemplary. Since our membership in 1948 Sri Lanka has been the centre of several ILO activities and today the Colombo office covers the Republic of the Maldives as well and is one of a network of nine offices in the Asia Pacific region.

Apart from its role in pursuance of its mandate, and Sri Lanka's own compliance with many of its key Conventions, the ILO has currently undertaken a number of ongoing projects in fields deemed important to us at this juncture such as the rehabilitation of returning workers from the Gulf and the Integrated Entrepreneurship Development Programme. There are several other fields which will require projects particularly in the context of our open economy and the prospects of reaching NIC status in the foreseeable future. Turning to the region as a whole, I feel there is much to be done for which the funds available are grossly inadequate considering the immense problems of the countries concerned such as the high populations, impoverishment, and appalling disparities in living standards with which we are all too familiar. The need for an expanded aid programme merits the urgent attention of this Conference and I intend to refer to this in the course of our deliberations.

In concluding this brief statement may I say again how much I value this opportunity for fellowship with my dear and distinguished colleagues from the world over and for collectively addressing our minds to the problems facing us, under the benign patronage of the ILO so that through our combined wisdom and experience we can find solutions. I wish the ILO all success in these endeavours but even if we are unable to resolve all of them, the opportunity of coming to grips with them is a valuable and almost priceless one which will enable us at the end of our deliberations to return to our respective battle stations, the richer for the experience.

Mr. De VRIES (Minister of Social Affairs and Employment, Netherlands) – May I begin by congratulating Mr. Gray on his election as President of this Conference. Not only are we satisfied that the choice was a wise one, but we are also very pleased with the continuation of this fine tradition of having a representative of one of the social partners as chairperson when the Organization is celebrating a special occasion.

When I look back over the past 75 years, I see a parallel between developments in the labour movement and developments in the International Labour Organization.

Many of the demands made by the trade union movement have been incorporated in international labour Conventions. Aspects, which have been a focus for trade unionists, have also been a source of inspiration for the ILO agenda.

That does not mean that on this 75th anniversary of the ILO we can conclude that there is no work left to be done. There is still a long way to go before the level of social justice we would like to see will be the norm everywhere. So, the question is – where do we go from here? What role must the ILO play today, in a global environment where international communism is no longer on the agenda as an alternative and globalization of the economy is becoming more of a reality all the time?

In my opinion, there are two crucial aspects to consider when attempting to answer this question. Firstly, the role of international labour standards and, secondly, the role which a tripartite world organization has to play as a centre of expertise in the face of current economic developments. These are the aspects I should now like to discuss in more detail.

Let us first look at the way forward for international labour Conventions. What should our future approach be to Conventions? For my part, I believe we should exercise a policy of restraint with regard to the development of new standards. The total package of existing Conventions in any case covers the most fundamental social rights. We also know that fewer nations have chosen to ratify standards introduced recently. New standards often relate to very specific issues and therefore tend to go into greater detail. The consequence is a lesser degree of universal relevance and applicability, with fewer ratifications as a result.

For this reason, it would seem advisable to limit new Conventions strictly to questions which are of genuine worldwide relevance and not to select topics as a matter of routine on the principle that every year has to see a new Convention.

Having said that, I believe that the primary task of the ILO is to continue to monitor compliance with labour Conventions. In a world economy of an increasingly global nature, with a growing risk of unfair competition, international labour standards will play an important role in guaranteeing social justice. Otherwise, as the Director-General, Michel Hansenne puts in his Report for this Conference, there is a threat that the law of the jungle will prevail, not only in international but also in national labour relations. That is why it is so good that the ILO monitoring mechanism is without equal within the United Nations system. The combination of the high quality of work of the Committee of Experts and the tripartite monitoring mechanism ensures effective control. Countries which have to justify their actions do not like being put on the spot. Monitoring remains therefore important.

However, I think several Conventions are becoming a little outdated and revision of a number of them would be called for in the eyes of my Government. One that comes to mind is the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96) – and it is with great interest that we will follow the general discussion on private employment agencies in relation to this Convention. We believe that private employment agencies will contribute significantly to a more flexible labour market and we would like to see Convention No. 96 adapted in such a way that the revised version gives room for our ideas.

In the case of Conventions having outlived their natural lives, we should not be too hesitant to revoke them. To summarize, as far as Conventions are concerned, the emphasis should no longer be on making new ones but rather on "maintenance work" on the existing ones and on monitoring.

But, if there is to be less emphasis on the development of new standards, where should the Organization be focusing its attention? That brings me to the second aspect I would like to discuss. In my opinion, the ILO should develop into a tripartite bureau of expertise. Activities would have to focus on roughly three categories of countries which can be distinguished in the world today – and the ILO must have a real significance for the countries in each of these categories.

Firstly, I am thinking about the developing nations, where the social dimension is liable to come under threat as structural changes are made. The International Labour Organization should develop into a body which can enter into negotiations with the IMF and the World Bank on equal terms when it comes to the implementation of projects in these countries.

Secondly, I am thinking about the Central and Eastern European countries currently engaged in making up for lost time. In these countries the primary role of the ILO must be to promote tripartism and modern forms of labour relations.

Finally, the ILO could also have a significant role to play as far as the industrialized countries are concerned. Here, I am thinking in particular of the input which the ILO can have when we are addressing matters such as how we can maintain the welfare state in an economy which is taking on an increasingly global character.

Right from the start, close collaboration between employers, employees and governments has been characteristic for the ILO. This is a formula which has worked well, and it is my firm conviction that this tripartite approach has a future for the world as a whole. The International Labour Organization will remain the instrument through which this cooperation is achieved.

There is certainly a future for the ILO, as a worldwide tripartite organization, but this will not happen by itself. A shift in activities is needed. What I am trying to say by this is that, in the current stage of its life, the Organization must concentrate on maintenance of the system of standards which is already in place and on monitoring. In addition, as a tripartite bureau of expertise, the Organization must focus on the needs of the three categories of member nations to which I have already referred: the developing countries, the countries in transition and the industrialized countries.

If the ILO goes forward in this way, it is my conviction that the Organization can play a crucial role in the socio-economic changes taking place in the world. In saying this I am expressing my desire that the 75-year history of the Organization will be a source of inspiration for the ILO to remain the social conscience of the world.

Original Chinese: Mr. LI (Minister of Labour, China) – First of all, I would like to extend, on behalf of the Government of the People's Republic of China, sincere congratulations to the President on his election. I believe that this session of the Conference will achieve positive results under his guidance.

Over the past few years, the world has been undergoing profound and complex changes. The half-a-century-old bipolar pattern formed after the Second World War has come to an end and the world is moving towards multipolarity. However, the world is far from tranquil. Some contradictions, such as ethnic and religious strife and territorial disputes, hidden during the Cold War, are surfacing and armed conflicts have become more frequent. Meanwhile, worldwide economic recession has resulted in more social problems and aggravated impoverishment for many developing countries. All these have become destabilizing factors in the international situation. Peace and development, therefore, remain the two main aims the world is yet to attain. In my view, the ILO, on the occasion of its 75th anniversary, can achieve the target of seizing opportunities to meet challenges set out by the Director-General in his Report only by squarely facing reality and defining the development orientation and work priority in the new era and only in this way can this Conference, like the International Labour Conference in Philadelphia in 1944, add a glorious chapter to the history of the ILO.

I would like to stress three aspects regarding the future orientation of the ILO.

First of all, the transition from a bipolar to a multipolar world economic globalization has brought about new problems for all countries while the special social and economic development processes of different regions or countries have made their respective labour issues distinctive. For example, the past few years have witnessed economic stagnation in some regions and sustained growth in others. In the economic transition, some countries suffered economic recession with the unemployment rate lingering around 20 per cent, while some other countries managed to achieve a considerable growth rate and keep the unemployment rate low. The ILO should, in the light of the trend towards multipolarity, put an end to the ideological debate left over from the long-standing bipolar confrontation, cast aside the practice of applying the development model of one of the past two poles to all countries, respect the rights of all countries to choose independently their social system, values and development path in their real interests and take into full account the characteristics of all Members in economic, social and political development so as to promote global economic prosperity, safeguard social justice and protect the rights and interests of workers through strengthened cooperation with all Members.

Secondly, at a time of drastic historical changes employment promotion is the mandate of the ILO as well as its most distinctive work with regard to the division of responsibility among international organizations. The Director-General pointed out in his Report that the number of people registered as unemployed throughout the world amounted to 120 million, while 700 million people were underemployed. So in the world today it is a matter of urgency for developing and developed countries to tackle the problem of unemployment. If in the face of such a situation the ILO can take employment promotion as its top priority, strengthen cooperation with the relevant international organizations and render effective support to the member States in the promotion of employment, then it will be able to play its unique role amongst the various international organizations and win respect from the international community and other international organizations and support from labourers worldwide. Only with positive progress in employment promotion will it be possible to prevent the discussions on the protection of rights, interests and human rights of workers and from becoming empty talk.

Thirdly, the application of international labour standards and technical cooperation are two major means with which the ILO obtains the basic end of promoting social justice. International labour standards set over the past 75 years cover almost all areas of the world of work and have contributed to the labour legislation of the member States. In this new period of history, the important task the ILO is faced with is to revise the standards in the light of ongoing economic development, and make them more flexible so as to apply them more extensively. To this end, efforts should be made to strengthen technical cooperation and technical advice. However, the application of certain standards should not be regarded as prerequisites for technical cooperation for that will be detrimental to the ILO's standards application activities in developing countries. At present the ILO lacks adequate funds for technical cooperation. We understand this difficulty and hope that the ILO will carry out cooperation with the member States to explore new channels of financing and provide through various means more technical cooperation and technical advice to developing countries better suited to their needs, with a view to enhancing its status and influence in the world of work.

The Director-General said in his Report that the sustained economic development of China in the 1990s will bring about material progress to a considerable proportion of the world's population. The important reason behind such sustained economic development amid drastic changes in the world is that we have adhered to a policy of reform and liberalization in the light of our national conditions and set the goal of establishing a socialist market economic structure after years of exploration. In the transition from the past planned economy to the new market-oriented economy, the Government of China has intensified cooperation with entrepreneurs and trade union organizations and has all along accorded priority to promoting employment, alleviating poverty and protecting the rights and interests of workers, with a view to providing a stable social environment for accelerated economic growth. Since the beginning of the 1990s, the urban unemployment rate has been kept below 3 per cent and in real terms, workers' average income has risen by 4.5 per cent. At the same time, we have speeded up the reform of the social security system by expanding the coverage of unemployment insurance and introducing a socialized pension system in order to guarantee the livelihood of unemployed and retired persons. We have strengthened labour legislation and established a mechanism for labour inspection to protect the rights and interests of workers. We have taken strict measures to deal with the serious violations of the rights and interests of employees in some private enterprises and Sino-foreign joint ventures. China's practice has shown that in the transition towards the market economy, if we proceed from our own conditions and at the same time draw upon the successful experience of the advanced market economies, we will be able to avoid social unrest, economic recession and protect the rights and interests of the labourers in the course of reform and improve their livelihood.

In order to meet the need of building a socialist market economy, the Government of China has made the decision this year to take a comprehensive approach to the all-round reform in the world of work centring on fostering and developing the labour market. This constitutes an important measure in building the socialist market economy. As a country opening wide to the outside world, we hope to intensify our cooperation with the ILO and its member States in this field and learn from their experience with a view to ensuring a smooth transition towards the market economic structure. We also hope that in this new period of history, China will make its own contribution to ILO activities and work with it to promote the cause of international labour.

Mr. KAEOTHONG (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Thailand) – On behalf of the delegation of the Royal Thai Government, I extend our greetings to you all. I would like to congratulate the President on his election to this high office.

We welcome the Report of the Director-General which is innovative in many ways. The theme of social justice in a global economy is highly appropriate. In the Report of the Director-General, the collection and dissemination of information have rightly been given high priority. I hope this work will be organized in a way that can help developing countries like Thailand. For example, we have achieved significant progress in reducing child labour and in promoting collective bargaining and the right of workers to organize.

Some developed countries seem to be under the impression that our competitiveness in the world economy depends on cheap labour and inferior working conditions. In practice, both these aspects have improved significantly. We do not think that working conditions can be improved overnight. We would therefore like to stress the need for delinking these issues from international trade. In this connection, we urge the Conference to accord the highest priority to the consideration of our draft resolution on this issue, which is vital for the expansion of the labour force in both developed and developing countries.

Meanwhile, 1993 has seen important developments in the field of labour and social welfare in Thailand. In September 1993 a fully-fledged Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare became operational. Immediately after its establishment the Ministry prepared an action plan to assist the drought-affected rural population with income-generating activities by providing access to skill development, working capital, marketing and other inputs.

In the labour field, several reforms have been launched such as: provision of 90 days for maternity leave with pay; provision for a maximum of 24 hours' overtime per week; and a proposal to grant the right to organize and collective bargaining to state enterprise workers.

Moreover, in view of the high rate of general and work accidents, our Government is in the process of launching a "National Safety Year" which will call upon employers and workers, non-governmental organizations and the public to participate collectively and jointly in the campaign.

Thailand has the privilege of being a founder member and has actively participated in the work of the ILO. Since 1950 Thailand has received assistance from the ILO in various fields. The most historic joint efforts were the passage of the First Labour Act of 1950 and the Social Insurance Act of 1990. I convey our Government's appreciation to the ILO for its steady and continued support.

I wish to conclude by congratulating all Members of the ILO on the occasion of its 75th anniversary and by expressing our renewed support for the Declaration of Philadelphia and the objective of social justice for all.

Original Vietnamese: Mr. TRAN DINH HOAN (Minister for Labour, the Disabled and Social Affairs, Viet Nam) – First of all allow me on behalf of the Government delegation of the Socialist Republic of Viet Nam to express our warm congratulations to the President and other Officers of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference on their unanimous elections. I would also like to welcome Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, and all the distinguished participants to this session of the Conference. The 81st Session of the International Labour Conference is a very important event because it coincides with the ILO's 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Viet Nam highly appreciates ILO activities during the 75 years of its existence, especially in the field of labour protection and the promotion of social justice.

We consider that the ILO's 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia are a good occasion for us to reconfirm the ILO's principles and objectives. The ILO's governing principles, such as equal pay, the right to pursue freely material well-being and spiritual development are still valid today. These are exactly what Viet Nam has been trying to achieve.

On this occasion I have the honour to inform this session of the Conference that on 30 May 1994 the Government of Viet Nam ratified 12 ILO Conventions. These are Conventions Nos. 5, 6, 14, 27, 45, 80, 81, 116, 120, 123, 124 and 155. This clearly indicates the commitment of the people and the Government of Viet Nam to the ILO's principles and objectives. This is also the most remarkable activity with which to celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO.

Since the end of 1986, Viet Nam has embarked upon a policy of restructuring which aims to shift to a market economy and to develop the rule of law, with government of the people, by the people and for the people.

The restructuring, with its interlinked economic and political features, promotes human rights and citizen rights in every economic, political, cultural and social aspect of life. In spite of all difficulties, up to now, Viet Nam has contained inflation, recovered from economic recession and achieved an annual GDP growth of 7.2 per cent during the last three years. Average export turn-over increased by 20 per cent, and it is the first time we have achieved a balance of trade. From a country which suffered food shortages, Viet Nam has now become an exporter of 1.5 to 2 million tons of rice per year. Foreign direct investment in Viet Nam amounts to US$6.5 billion, with more than 700 projects, of which one-quarter has been successful.

New progress has also been achieved in the field of health care, disease prevention and education, especially in primary education and the eradication of illiteracy. Domestic economic accumulation has been recorded. The life of the people has been gradually improved.

In general, we can say that Viet Nam has come through the crisis and entered into a new phase of development. These results have strengthened the people's confidence, enhanced political and social stability and created conditions for further development of the country.

The Socialist Republic of Viet Nam rejoined ILO activities in May 1992. We have so far been trying our best to adequately fulfil our obligations as a member State. We greatly appreciate the ILO's technical assistance in the field of labour administration, employment, social security, vocational training and the rehabilitation of disabled persons.

With ILO technical assistance, the first Labour Code of Viet Nam has been drafted, finalized and made public for comments. It is now being considered by the National Assembly, and hopefully will be promulgated at its sitting on 15 June, 1994. In our opinion, the Code not only protects the rights and interests of the working people and the legitimate rights and interests of employers in Viet Nam, but also, to some extent embodies many provisions of international labour standards.

We have also achieved remarkable results in employment programmes. During the last three years from 1991 to 1993 jobs have been created for 2.28 million people, of whom 960,000 found employment in 1993 alone. Great efforts have been made to promote the development of small and medium-sized enterprises, to increase the effectiveness of labour utilization, to reform the system of wages and salaries and of social security with special care for socially vulnerable groups, such as women and children.

All activities in the field of labour and social affairs have contributed actively to the socio-economic development of the country.

Viet Nam will support ILO programmes and activities in the years to come, especially those in the field of social development, employment, social security and those dealing with women and adolescents.

However, we consider that the implementation of ILO Conventions should not be linked to international trade. In the field of labour and social affairs we focus on the formation of a strategy for human resource development with a view to effectively using the presently available labour force and promoting employment through developing a new and qualified labour force structure to meet the requirements of industrialization, modernization, free economic zones and joint ventures. We are strengthening the capacity of labour institutions and developing a body of instruments to bring the Labour Code into practice. We are also establishing a uniform and independent social security system. We attach special importance to protecting the rights and interests of the most vulnerable groups, such as children, women, the disabled and old people, promoting the ratification of other ILO Conventions and taking part in the formulation of new instruments.

In the light of the restructuring and reforms, I would like to request that the Director-General of the International Labour Office consider opening an ILO field office in Hanoi as required by its past and future activities in Viet Nam.

I believe that in the future, technical cooperation between the ILO and Viet Nam will become broader, deeper and more effective. We are also working towards the development of bilateral cooperation with all the other ILO member States.

I also believe that with the active contribution of member States, the ILO will be able to adapt to the new situations in order to achieve its noble objectives.

To conclude my statement, I would like to reconfirm my confidence that this session of the International Labour Conference will be a success.

Mr. KEARNEY (representative of the International Textile, Garment & Leather Workers' Federation) – Despite their public protestations, some governments and many employers' organizations are not committed to, nor do they have faith in, the fundamental principles and values upon which the ILO was founded: witness the recent declaration by the New Zealand Employers' Federation chief that "the ILO was a blot to the country's economic horizon" and that "unions are not a necessary or required group in the employment relationship".

Regrettably, such an outrageous and irresponsible approach is not uncommon. The neo-liberalism of the past decade and a half has shattered much of the consensus built over the previous 50 years, resulting in a return to the machomanagement style of the eighteenth century. The deep recession which has engulfed the world helped to strengthen the arm of the musclemen managers, as did the globalization of ownership and production, whereby 37,000 non-financial multinationals with sales nearly 40 per cent greater than the world's total exports of goods and services now control over one-third of the private sector's productive assets worldwide.

The textile, clothing and leather sectors typify the effects of globalization. Wages have fallen, working conditions have deteriorated, child labour is on the upsurge and health and safety standards have plummeted.

Without trade unions and without a strong and effective ILO, who will protect the men, women and children – more than 30 million of them worldwide – who daily produce textiles, clothing, shoe and leather items for sale in world markets?

In Indonesia there was no one to speak up for Titi Sugiarti. Titi was only 23 years old, but she understood the meaning of exploitation very well. She and her fellow workers went on strike earlier this year at the shoe company where they worked. Little changed, so another strike was planned. But Titi won't be there. Her body was found one morning about a month ago, floating in the company's waste disposal pit after screams had been heard in the night. She had been bound and tortured before she died.

Titi died because of government and employer suppression of free and independent trade unions.

In China, suppression of the right to organize contributed to the death of 81 young women six months ago in Shenzhen. Stitching stuffed toys for export, they were little more than slaves. After the fire, more than 50 charred bodies were found piled behind one of the locked exits ...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MENDOZA) – Will the speaker please keep to the agenda item.

Mr. KEARNEY – Three weeks later, another fire in a textile complex in Fuzhou left a further 63 women dead after they suffocated in their beds in the ceiling area over the factory. These women died because they had no one to speak up for them to help secure their rights ...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MENDOZA) – A point of order has been raised by China and Indonesia.

Original Chinese: Mr. ZHANG WEI (Government adviser, China)[1] – I wish to raise a point of order under paragraph 14.5 of the Standing Orders since the speaker has departed from the matter under discussion and launched an attack against a sovereign State. I ask the President to intervene to prevent this violation of the Standing Orders.

Original English: Mr. LATIEF (Minister of Manpower, Indonesia) – I would like to take the opportunity to explain about the case referred to by the textiles representative. None of the information is true. If you need more information, we can give it.

Mr. KEARNEY – Without trade unions and without an effective ILO, who will defend and release the small hands which make big profits for the carpet industry? In Karah, Pakistan, five-year-old Shakeel works alongside 300 other children from 6 a.m. to 7 p.m. for less than 20 cents a day. A sign on the wall says any child caught sleeping will be fined the equivalent of US$60 ...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MENDOZA) – Again I would like to remind the speaker to please confine himself to the agenda.

Mr. KEARNEY – These are not images drawn from a fevered imagination. They are day-to-day occurrences involving workers in the textile industry. In every case mentioned, the employers involved were either multinational companies or were producing for multinational companies. The goods they produce, in conditions of virtual serfdom, for the high-street stores of Europe, North America, Japan and the rest of the industrialized world do not come cheap for the consumer. For example, the wage costs in a $60 shirt are often less than 10 cents.

Yet the apologists for this exploitation tell us that labour legislation and trade unions are an unnecessary hindrance to the free operation and profitability of enterprises and an anachronism in the 1990s. Would those ministers who rail so consistently against international labour standards, would those industrialists who decry the existence of trade unionism submit their own children to a lifetime of working conditions such as these?

On the agenda of this year's session of the International Labour Conference, there is a depressing resolution from the ASEAN countries suggesting that many ILO standards are not appropriate to the different economic, cultural and social conditions of developing countries and should be applied flexibly. This is not the voice of the people of the countries concerned. It is instead an echo of the demands of multinational enterprises which are temporarily using these countries as an operating base.

Remember, the standards referred to are the right to organize and bargain collectively, the non-use of prison labour, the prohibition of child labour and non-discrimination. They are basic and cannot be dependent on economic or social conditions or on cultural background. Is it not ironic that countries which fought for so long to free themselves from the bonds of traditional colonialism should now be delivered into the arms of the new-breed colonialists – the multinational companies? How can these governments put the interests of multinational capital before those of their own people?

The ILO was established to contribute to universal and lasting peace through the promotion and development of social justice by setting standards and securing their application worldwide, using persuasion, pressure, advice and technical assistance. These aims and methods are as valid today as they were in 1919.

Standard-setting is the core of the ILO's role. Conventions are attainable standards and the fall-off in ratification and the non-implementation of ratified Conventions are more a result of the recent indecisiveness of the ILO itself than of the impracticality of the Conventions concerned. Proposals for the introduction of "soft laws" permitting the non-implementation of certain provisions will not assist workers. Rather, it is an excuse for doing nothing. Nor can flexibility be permitted in the application of the core Conventions. Every worker, regardless of his or her workplace, has the right to organize and bargain collectively. Forced labour can never be acceptable nor can child labour or discrimination. On these points, there can be no compromise. Soft law is a soft option and will lead nowhere.

The International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation, alongside the rest of the international labour movement, believes that the days when the ILO could rely on persuasion to enforce standards are long past. Today, the mechanism for enforcement should be a link between trade and workers' rights, a concept which has become known as the social clause.

Some governments, egged on by multinational employers, have been suggesting that trade unions want to impose an international minimum wage. Others suggest that the social clause is purely a protectionist measure aimed at destroying the competitive advantage of lower labour costs enjoyed by developing countries.

Both are lies! Linking trade and workers' rights has nothing to do with establishing a standard minimum wage. It has everything to do with the application of the core Conventions of the ILO ensuring that workers, whether in Geneva or Guatemala City, Gabarone or Guangzhou, should be able at the end of a working period to feed and clothe themselves and their families and provide a roof over their heads, a basic education for their children and medical care when ill.

The cost of these basic needs varies between countries, and the wages needed to meet them should be determined by the time-honoured means of collective bargaining between representatives of workers and employers. But that requires workers to have the right to organize into trade unions and to use that organization to bargain collectively with employers.

The purpose of seeking a social clause in trade agreements is to achieve a fair return for workers' labour, thus securing social justice. Nothing more, nothing less. That is why the ILO must climb into the driving-seat and re-establish its role as the lead player in international labour issues. It must endorse the link between trade and workers' rights as the means of enforcing its own core standards. And it must insist on a mechanism that is clear and transparent and that includes a complaints procedure followed by investigation with the offer of technical advice and assistance. Only persistent disregard by the country concerned would incur punishment. Thus can respect be regained by the ILO for the global application of internationally recognized labour standards.

But this will require change on the part of the ILO itself. Over-cautious and timid, it has appeared weak in recent years. However, given the dramatic changes in the world economy, accompanied by the process of structural adjustment, the ILO has an opportunity to establish for itself a new and enhanced role. But it will have to earn that new role. It will have to look forward rather than to the past. It will have to be innovative. It will have to be decisive and avoid the quest for consensus being used to stifle real and effective activity. And it will have to insist that other international agencies which have hijacked labour issues in recent years now accept that the ILO is the competent body in this field.

If the ILO can renew itself and develop a new aggressiveness, if it can harness its energies to help governments outlaw exploitation and thus establish more rounded economies, then the blot on the economic horizon seen by New Zealand's employers will emerge as a sunrise for the world's workers, helping to bring to life that universal and lasting peace and social justice which the ILO was created to secure.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MENDOZA) – Before proceeding further, I would like to appeal to the speakers who will be called to the podium to please confine themselves to the items on the agenda. Thank you very much.

Mr. VUNIBOBO (Minister for Home Affairs, Immigration, Labour and Industrial Relations, Youth, Employment Opportunities and Sport, Fiji) – I would like to join previous speakers in offering congratulations to the President on his election to this very important office of the Conference.

This, is the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, and I would like to take this opportunity, on behalf of the Government and the people of Fiji, to offer our congratulations and best wishes to the ILO. The Report of the Director-General to the Conference this year addresses the important tasks that face this Organization on its 75th anniversary: the tasks of defending values and promoting change; defending the values that were mooted by the founding fathers of the Organization and promoting change that responds to the demands of the circumstances.

The collapse of the Berlin Wall and the disintegration of the Communist bloc have hopefully put an end to the long-standing ideological confrontation between East and West. Now, the ILO, facing the consequences of the new state of world affairs should, we believe, seize the initiative and expand its activities to areas which have been left by the wayside.

Here, I would like to refer to the Director-General's Report which cited a provision in the Declaration of Philadelphia, namely that "it is a responsibility of the International Labour Organization to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of this fundamental objective [social justice]" and, in that light, to "include in its decisions and recommendations any provisions which it considers appropriate". We believe that if there were a time for that provision to be implemented, that time is now.

The time may be opportune for a review of the ILO's overall approach so as to respond more positively to the needs of small developing countries. As it is, small countries with limited resources, small populations and small domestic markets are pitted against competitors who are big in every sense of the word. They are also likely to be singled out for violations of rules in contrast to more economically and politically powerful transgressors who not infrequently are allowed to go unchallenged.

Although Fiji, like most of her neighbours, is in geographical terms a series of islands, we are no longer isolated from what is happening around us. We sell our sugar to the European Union, and our tuna. Our garments find their way to the United States and New Zealand, and some come to Europe.

As countries in the Pacific Region grapple with issues related to poverty alleviation, job creation, economic viability and competitiveness, quality of life at work, higher productivity and social justice, it is seen that the form of industrial relations and tripartism based on freedom of association and social dialogue becomes even more significant. The development of industrial relations systems and the promotion of social and constructive labour relations remain a major challenge to most countries in the region.

We support the observations made by the Director-General in his Report that the world of work itself has undergone a complete upheaval and that conditions existing now bear little resemblance to those which existed when the ILO was first established. With the introduction of new technologies, the production process and the product market now place different demands on management and workers. Aside from the changing requirements on the quality and quantity of work and production, some new types of relations have been introduced in the workplace as a result mainly of management initiatives. Workers may also need to adjust themselves to fit in with the changing environment. They can now be more concerned with the quality of their working life. In line with these changes, the strategic process to promote better industrial relations through consultation and cooperation requires adjustment and continuous review.

The Director-General's discussion on "the globalization of the economy" puts into perspective the plight of Third World and developing countries. Technological change, while so vital to development, is in many cases disruptive. It displaces and, too often, eliminates jobs. It devalues traditional know-how and creates a need for new skills.

The concurrent integration of financial markets and the massive flow of capital between countries will, in certain circumstances, not benefit some developing countries. Their creditworthiness is often called into question and, not infrequently, they will not reap the benefits of international financial integration.

It is in that connection that I would invite the International Labour Organization to look into the possibility of setting up regulatory machinery at the international level.

For the foreseeable future, our major preoccupation will be the generation of employment, the creation of an environment geared to improved productivity, enhanced competitiveness, improved working conditions and remuneration packages that respond to the needs of employees and reflect greater productivity. That will require a lot of work, dialogue and exchanges among all of us, Workers' representatives, Employers and Governments. We will need a lot of help and we look to the ILO to provide assistance and guidance in some of the areas which we will be addressing.

In the same context, we endorse the Director-General's Report which says that "tripartism is indeed a precious institution, but it is only as valuable as it is effective".

We share the view of the ILO that tripartite consultation is essential to good industrial relations. It must, however, generate new ideas and arrangements that are to the benefit of the nation as a whole. The government leg of the tripartite stool must ensure that the interests of those not represented, including the unemployed, are taken into account.

The Fiji Government has been greatly concerned with the issue of job creation. Our economy did not perform well in the 1980s, at least in comparison to some of the achievements of our Asian friends. We did not generate employment opportunities, nor did we generate growth in incomes.

In the late 1980s, we took some sharp policy decisions to arrest this downward trend. We will have even more school-leavers looking for jobs in the 1990s.

We turned from an import substitution stance to an emphasis on exporting, and embarked on a number of measures to make the economy more competitive. We reformed our tax system; we lifted most of the licensing requirements for imports; we introduced a phased programme of tariff reductions; and we introduced reforms in the labour market.

Our wage-setting system in the 1980s was strongly centralized, with statutory maximum settlements established through tripartite discussions. The reforms were designed to introduce more commercial sensitivity into the system – in the expectation that firms would become more competitive.

The early indications are that the strategy is working, settlements have become more valid and the incidence of strikes has fallen. Employment has continued to rise throughout the period of global recession.

Original Spanish: Mr. CASSIA (Workers' delegate, Argentina) – In my country, a deep and truly scientific debate on labour law and labour relations is being conducted on changes taking place in the productive sphere, their impact on individual or collective labour relations and the standards that govern them.

For the time being this debate has been hampered – not by us – but because people have preferred to force reality, to put it into pre-conceived categories, without making a preliminary analysis enabling them to glean valid and useful considerations from it.

We understand that certain standards and basic tenets of labour law and social security cannot remain removed from the profound changes that have occurred and will occur in the economy – not only in Argentina but throughout the world.

Because of this, the Argentinean workers' movement is aware that to accompany a process of economic growth, it is necessary to adapt some regulatory mechanisms of labour law. However, it maintains that to achieve this adjustment the only means is collective bargaining – collective bargaining carried out within a framework of total freedom, since its regulation exclusively would be totally detrimental to the most unprotected sector, i.e. that of the workers.

We are ready to seek consultation and not confrontation but this does not mean that we will concede what is not due – nor that we will be accomplices of interests opposed to ours.

We accept the changes which improve the Argentinean economy in the light of prevailing social and labour conditions, through everyone's efforts and a fairly distributed sacrifice; but we reject those which claim to reduce the trade union presence as a balancing factor or attempt to produce an arbitrary and unjust deterioration of working conditions.

Production, work and a fair distribution of the wealth are fundamental factors which must be oriented and put at the disposal of the human community and to the use of the common weal. (The Laborem Exercens encyclical.)

The serious and dire nature of the social problems confronting us require us to seek immediate solutions and to implement programmes for these sectors of the community most affected by the adjustment, so that they do not feel abandoned by the community.

We know that without economic stability it is impossible to function as an organized community; but we also know that it alone cannot guarantee the existence of a modern and just society.

In Argentina, peace and equity amongst the social actors can only be founded on social justice.

The inhuman working conditions which entail poverty and deprivation create discontent and crying injustices which generate threats to political harmony and coexistence in a democracy.

The State, assuming a new role, must look out for the people's well-being and strive to do away with social and economic inequalities.

Labour reforms which violate universal legal conscience – clearly expressed and definitely expressed in the international principles and standards of the ILO – can only create a weakening of the social actors and give rise to social insensitivity.

Setting out to reduce the serious problems of health, education and social security to a mere economic tenet – forgetting the leading role which the Argentinean workers' movement has had in these areas – seems to us to be more an attempt to undermine trade unions rather than a a genuine concern for the present and the future of the workers.

The world is changing substantially – but unfortunately not all changes are positive. On the contrary, some embody serious dangers for humanity by dividing societies and worsening social differences.

The weakening of the State encourages conservative sectors to promote regressive changes in labour legislation which tend to make employment precarious and weaken trade unions. There are political and ideological currents which appear to be trying to take the labour relations systems back to the times of the first industrial revolution, with the consequent manifestations of over-exploitation and marginalization of the workers – gloomy scenarios which His Holiness Pope John Paul II has repeatedly defined as the danger inherent in the establishing of an inhumane capitalism.

The ILO, by virtue of the fact that it is part of the United Nations system and its mandate, is at the crux of this world change. The major challenge, as stated by the Director-General, is that the ILO should become the leading institution which promotes social justice and equity for a new international scenario – as it did in 1919 and in 1945. Thus in the World Summit for Social Development, to be held in Denmark in 1995, the ILO must play an essential role in the defence of its initial objectives.

The development of tripartism and the adherence by countries of international Conventions will pave the way for a new relationship between workers, employers and the State, which will harmonize changes in the economies and the enterprises, while preserving employment and the extension of collective bargaining.

The policy of "active association" and the role of the technical multidisciplinary teams will, without a doubt, enable the ILO to cooperate more closely with its members – in particular with the workers' organizations.

The Argentinean workers' movement considers that to ensure a greater political, economic and social democracy in today's world, it is necessary to: launch, on this the 75th anniversary of the ILO, an international campaign in favour of a world charter of workers' rights which fully takes into account basic human rights; negotiate within the World Trade Organization the introduction of a social clause which will make comparative trade privileges and advantages contingent upon the compliance of basic workers' rights, through the application of fundamental ILO Conventions; see to it that the World Bank and the IMF accept that investment-promoting policies and structural adjustment must include a social dimension and the right of trade unions to take part in the design and implementation of the abovementioned policies – strengthened so that they can fulfil the fundamental mandate in a world in crisis. The ILO's potential in this area is obvious; but it will depend on the political will of its constituent members to agree with the objectives and programmes so that its mandate is strengthened.

The Argentinean workers' movement has accepted the challenge created by the new world situation, assuming what it considers a historic responsibility on account of the changes taking place in our country; we accept this, but only on condition that we remain active participants in the construction of a new society and that this will be achieved through social dialogue.

We believe that today the main discussion is development and its ethical, political and economic relationship with equity. In the same way stability is also an achievement of the workers and must be upheld.

We also believe in the need for a just society, based on solidarity, which offers truly equal opportunities for all its members – where unemployment and divisions are no longer accepted with resignation and are actively opposed.

Our way ahead is quite clear. In the face of unbridled capitalism which creates marginality and misery, let us establish a more humane capitalism based on the Christian concept of solidarity which strengthens people's integration.

The transformations that have occurred in Argentina have made us understand the need to adjust labour relations to new management and organizational technologies and must adjust to other characteristics of the national labour market.

However, the changes made must be carried out on the basis of investment policies, accompanied by real workers' participation in the process of change, in employment policies and in environmental protection.

Finally, I would like to stress that this threat to labour rights and trade union rights is not only a challenge to individual societies, but also to each and every region of the world. And I should like to assert that we are prepared to accept the responsibility of today's social charters and clauses.

I do not want to leave this rostrum without extending the greetings of the Argentinean workers to the South African delegation and by congratulating them on their long but victorious struggle.

Mr. TAMRAKAR (Minister of State for Labour and Industry, Nepal) – First of all, the Nepalese delegation would like to extend its warmest congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to the high office of President of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, observing the historic event of the 75th anniversary of the ILO. On this historic occasion, I would like to express my sincere congratulations to the representatives of governments, employers and workers who have assembled here from various parts of the world. We are fully confident that the deliberations of this Conference will arrive at meaningful conclusions under the President's able guidance and stewardship.

It is our great pleasure to announce to this august gathering that His Majesty's Government of Nepal has minted silver coins of various denominations depicting the logo of the ILO's 75th anniversary. We are also printing postage stamps to commemorate this occasion, and publishing posters that depict the ILO logo together with the slogan for the promotion of tripartite understanding.

We would like to express our sincere thanks to the ILO authorities for accepting our request to open the ILO Office in Kathmandu. Now, we hope that the areas for cooperation between Nepal and the ILO will be extended further and special programmes for strengthening industrial relations will be outlined by the ILO in the future.

I would like to express my sincere thanks to the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General of the ILO and their staff for their efforts in preparing the comprehensive Report. We attach great importance to the Report of the Director-General which gives a comprehensive and lucid view of the new challenges that are emerging in the world. The issues analysed in the Report such as the values and structures of the ILO, its standard-setting procedures, tripartism and the role of the ILO in the international policy-making are very relevant, timely and immensely useful.

The topics on part-time work and safety and health in mines, which have been included in the agenda for discussion, call for careful deliberations. I am of the view that the application of ILO standards and rules should take into account the particular conditions and stages of economic development of developing countries. Otherwise, there will always be uncertainty regarding the ratifying of Conventions by member States. It has been amply explained in the Director-General's Report that the rate of ratification of Conventions has been declining for a good number of years. In addition, it should be noted that the 1993 Session of the Conference also decided that the ILO should immediately review and update existing labour Conventions and standards for their more meaningful and pragmatic application.

The present Government is firmly committed to the welfare and prosperity of labour. The Government has sufficiently understood the essence of tripartism in nation building. It has recently promulgated labour regulations and trade union rules. Organizing the general elections of trade unions in the near future is under way.

The participation of women in industrialization is equally important to overall development strategy.

We are fully aware of this and a number of operational activities are being undertaken with the objective of greater participation of women in the economic and social sectors. In order to make women self-reliant, comprehensive skill development programmes for them should be developed under technical cooperation programmes of the ILO.

After a long and popular struggle, parliamentary democracy has been restored in Nepal and this has initiated the process of industrialization in the country. As a result of the adoption of various policy instruments, carpet industries are especially gaining ground as a major source of export earnings; moreover, these industries have provided employment to thousands of people as these carpet products have found markets in European and other countries. In view of these benefits, we are very much concerned with the misunderstandings that are being created by vested interest groups concerning our carpet industries. His Majesty's Government is fully committed to the welfare of children and to the enforcement of laws and regulations against the use of child labour in any industrial establishments. The Labour Act prohibits the use of child labour under the age of 14 in any industry. The Government has no limitations on the steps and actions it may take against the breach and violation of these laws and regulations. We therefore urge all of you to extend your generous support and cooperation for the benefit of workers and for the better future of their children.

We have been talking a great deal about the environment. To the best of my knowledge, unplanned industrialization has been one of the major factors responsible for environmental degradation. The installation of effluent treatment plants, the relocation of industries in various parts of the country, the development of environmental education and public awareness about the environment are very important when efforts must be directed towards improving the ecological balance. These programme activities require huge financial resources for which the involvement of international organizations is crucial.

This is the time to undertake vigorous result-oriented activities to achieve the noble objectives and goals of our Organization. The organizational restructuring of the ILO and the pursuance of its active partnership policy would go a long way in this respect. We feel there is room for improvement in the existing budgetary system. Once the programmes and projects are finalized by the ILO and the country concerned, further approval from other agencies delays timely implementation of projects. I would, therefore, like to draw your kind attention to the simplification of financial procedures for technical cooperation projects.

Being one of the least developed countries, Nepal faces daunting challenges with respect to its socio-economic development. At the same time, we consider that procedures for the utilization of resources made available by international organizations and donor communities should be simplified as much as possible in order to overcome coordination problems when various channels are involved. There is an urgent need for a more liberal approach by developed countries in resolving the unemployment problems of developing nations in the face of rapid industrialization and economic globalization.

My delegation would like to emphasize once again that as a land-locked least developed country, Nepal needs special treatment in terms of technical and financial assistance both from industrialized countries as well as from international organizations. This would definitely help accelerate the phases of the Kingdom's special economic development.

Last, but not least, I appeal to all the developed countries for their open-hearted help to strengthen the ILO's capacity to assist in the development and promotion of mankind on the eve of the twenty-first century.

Having said all this, I wish this Conference every success in its deliberations.

Original Spanish: Mr. ANTONIOLI-VASQUEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Peru) – The session of the International Labour Conference that brings us together today is being held on this happy occasion of the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the creation of the International Labour Organization and of 50 years since the adoption of the Declaration of Philadelphia. On this special occasion the Government of Peru would like to salute the ILO's fruitful work in the interests of its member States. We also commend its commitment to the convictions that gave rise to the Organization and to its mandate to see to it by democratic and tripartite means that its unshakeable principles of humanity and justice are respected in practice.

We are delighted that a Worker delegate has been chosen to preside over the Conference. And what better sign of the times can we find as the ILO faces a new stage in its history than the return to our Organization of the tripartite delegation of the Republic of South Africa.

In his Report the Director-General once again highlights the fact that the globalization of economic relations which has accelerated considerably in the last few years is leading to inequality between nations and within those nations. This is because of the different capabilities of countries to adjust to new economic trends. Many countries are thus completely marginalized from the world economic system that is taking shape.

Therefore, the international community should establish on the world level regulating machinery capable of adapting to the social problems of the working world. One way to face up to this situation is to revitalize the mandate of the ILO without delay.

Another interesting aspect of the Report of the Director-General is that it identifies as a management priority for the authorities of the entire world the creation of productive and freely chosen employment. This is a field in which the work of the ILO is fundamental.

We believe the Director-General's concrete proposal that the ILO should prepare a report that contains an up-to-date analysis of the situation of employment and income in the world, and also on the repercussions of economic and financial policies in this field is of the greatest interest. This Report should "propose alternative policies that need to be adopted nationally and internationally to reconcile the need for economic growth and stability with the no less pressing need for more jobs and higher incomes for the poor."

The proposal that the Conference should permanently have on its agenda the examination of problems of employment and living standards in the world could lead to the adoption of a declaration which could express the points of view of the tripartite constituents of the ILO as regards the goals which have to be achieved and the policies which have to be applied. It would allow our countries to work to bring about some practical implementation of these objectives.

It has been said that one of the reasons that new jobs are not created is excessive legislation protecting workers and state interventionism, and that it is important to reduce this protection in order to increase employment, investment and competitivity. These measures have been called flexibility measures or deregulation of labour legislation. Nevertheless, according to many studies in this field, the usefulness of flexibility has only been proven in reducing labour costs. On the other hand, it has not shown the same effectiveness in practice when it comes to creating new jobs. Unemployment is increasing in spite of the fact that the economy is progressively growing.

Flexibility does not solve the problem of shortage of capital, which appears to be one of the main causes of unemployment. The employment which can be generated via atypical methods of labour recruitment is difficult to sustain because of its intrinsically precarious nature in the absence of equitable and sustained economic growth.

The reduction of costs cannot be considered as decisive in transforming production to increase the competitiveness of enterprises. The easy solution which flexibility is normally considered to be reduces costs rather than facilitating new employment. It instead facilitates the replacement of labour by technology.

This substitution is not taking place uniformly in Peru. Generally, we have observed that permanent staff have been replaced by casual labour, and obsolete equipment has not been replaced.

The annual bulletin of the National Society of Industries has emphasized that in January of this year the GDP increased by 9.75 per cent as compared with January of last year.

However, this growth in the industrial sector has not been accompanied by growth of employment in that sector. Employment dropped by 8 per cent, whereas labour productivity went up by 18 per cent. According to the National Society of Industries, employment is not increasing for various reasons, including streamlining of personnel due to enterprise restructuring which makes it necessary to buy new equipment.

Preliminary reports from the Ministry of Labour and Social Development in March of this year showed that the income of workers employed in private enterprises with ten or more workers significantly improved. Average monthly pay was approximately 1,440 new soles (or 650 dollars), whereas daily wages went up to 20.45 new soles ($9.30). In real terms, this is an increase of 64.5 and 40.8 per cent respectively. These are the best figures that have been achieved in the last four years.

In terms of employment, in the first three months of the year, we have observed increases compared with those of 1993. Whereas in 1993 unemployment was 9.9 per cent, in March 1994 it had gone down to 8.4 per cent. Underemployment in 1993 was 77.4 per cent, and 1994 it was 74.7 per cent. Full employment has gone up from 12.7 per cent to 16.9 per cent.

As regards minimum subsistence wages, in Peru these are now recovering. In April of this year, the minimum subsistence wage of unskilled workers went up from 72 to 132 soles a month (i.e. from about $32 to $60).

The high level of unemployment in our country is of concern to us. We wonder whether it is it true that we have so much underemployment or whether the statistics are based on false premises.

In some countries in Latin America the variables used for determining the number of underemployed people is the minimum legal wage. Workers earning less than the minimum subsistence wage are considered underemployed. Nevertheless, these workers spend more time at work than the standard work day.

In our country, we use a system based on the minimum subsistence wage for January 1967. This figure is indexed on the variation of the consumer price index that has been noted to date. Workers earning less are considered underemployed.

In 1967 the minimum subsistence wage was $40. The index variation of the consumer price index was 719.84 new soles, or $331.72, in December 1993. Workers who earn less than that amount are considered as underemployed, whereas in the countries mentioned above, the criteria for determining whether a worker is underemployed is a minimum wage of between $70 and $121.41.

There is obviously a problem here in the statistical procedures used. It is time they were updated.

Together with the National Statistical and Computer Institute, and with the technical help we have requested from the ILO, we are going to study a new system of measurement capable of analyzing our social and labour situation with more reliable and practical data so that we can really know whether there is an improvement in income and employment.

On the other hand, thousands of workers in our country who are trying to combat poverty and unemployment, have found the solution in family employment, self-employment and small and very small enterprises. They work either on their own account or in small groups that form family economic units or small partnerships.

In this informal and unstructured sector the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO count for nothing. This is another of the challenges facing the ILO. We therefore consider that the Director-General is quite right in calling for a revision of the system of international Conventions, when these are too complicated, as he is right in appealing to strengthen the core of fundamental Conventions, the general adoption of which would strengthen the positive attitude of the international community.

The appeal by the Director-General to strengthen social justice is of special importance for our countries, especially as we are making serious efforts to ensure that social justice is fully brought into practice. In reply to the question the Director-General asked as to whether we are the defenders of a world falling to pieces or the promoters of new solutions, I would venture to say that we, like this Organization for more than 75 years, have been promoting new and better solutions to ensure the welfare and progress of our peoples.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-KULAIB (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Kuwait) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I heartily congratulate the President on his election to the chair of the Conference and wish him success in this important task for which I trust he is well fitted. I also congratulate the Vice-Presidents, who I am sure will discharge their responsibilities to the best possible effect. I wish to take this opportunity to thank the Presidents of the previous sessions for their stewardship of the proceedings, in particular Mr. Abdel-Hak, President of the 80th Session.

I further wish to congratulate the Sultanate of Oman, South Africa, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan on their membership of the Organization. It gives me great pleasure to participate in this Conference which marks a great occasion, the 75th anniversary of the founding of the International Labour Organization which, prior to that date, was a distant dream and a mighty hope in the minds and hearts of social pioneers and thinkers. It then became a tangible fact with the establishment of an international organization after the First World War and the construction of the defences of peace. The establishment of the ILO heralded a new era of endeavour aimed at creating a world in which social justice prevails, a world of prosperity that believes in freedom of work, of expression and of association and that abhors poverty, oppression and exploitation. After this long period of tireless effort and unremitting struggle, we have before us the great achievements of our Organization in the field of labour and in the service of peoples throughout the world.

I wish to extend my warm congratulations to the ILO on this anniversary, hoping that it will achieve further progress, successfully addressing all the challenges that await it in the future.

The Director-General made a highly felicitous choice of subject for his Report this year, focusing on standards under the title Defending values, promoting change. It is a seminal document succinctly reviewing the Organization's activities over a period of 75 years on behalf of the working class and specifying its ambitions for change. It shows a deep understanding of the process of modernization under way throughout the world and of its problems and demands, so that the Organization stands on solid ground and has a clear vision of its historic responsibilities in the future with respect to the achievement of prosperity and social justice.

The importance of the subject of the Report and its emphasis on the standards laid down in 174 international labour conventions are demonstrated by the favourable impact and the practical benefits that have accrued therefrom for millions of workers and their families, for instance through the improvement of working conditions and the raising of their standards of living. As proof of my country's respect for these standards, we wish to announce to the Conference that we have promulgated the Organization's resolutions regarding overtime and forced labour.

We also support the Organization's position stated in the Director-General's Report regarding the role of democratic societies in basing legislation on justice, freedom and equality in order to ensure that human dignity is respected and to promote creativity. It is a position that our country has adopted since its foundation. In 1962 it made provision in its Constitution for the principle of consultation and participation by the people in controlling public affairs. This provision became a practical reality in the election of a Representative Council whose members served in an atmosphere of freedom and active participation guaranteed through press freedom and freedom of expression and association. We have also ratified a number of international labour conventions relating to basic human rights and freedoms, and protection of the rights of the working class. We have furthermore supported the principles of the Organization, implemented its decisions, participated in its work since we became a member in 1961 and continually supported its technical decisions.

The Director-General is to be highly commended for his study of the issues raised in the five chapters of his Report, including the changes that have occurred in the world in recent years and the values defended by the Organization, which is the social conscience of the world.

I wish to take this opportunity to express my country's view on the matters raised in the Director-General's Report in the form of the following ideas and proposals.

Firstly, we must seek to eliminate poverty and deprivation in the developing countries, in which large sectors of the population are the victims of unemployment and falling standards of living, by working for social equity and justice, the abolition of slavery and the settlement of conflicts by peaceful means.

Secondly, we must support the principle of tripartism in decision- making and consultation in addressing social and labour problems with a view to continued advancement of the aims of the Organization in order to achieve stability in labour relations and attain the ultimate goal of social justice, while at the same time seeking to avoid exploiting the Organization by forcing it to adopt political decisions such as those that encroach on the fields of competence of other bodies.

Thirdly, we must strengthen the role of standards in the future and show unwavering commitment to the Organization's achievements over the past 75 years, during which it helped to improve workers' circumstances and working conditions. We believe at the same time that those standards are consistent with the needs of the Member States and play an outstanding and effective role in international trade and the modern economy. We do not approve of the imposition of penalties to force countries to ratify standards but we are in favour of dialogue and persuasion as more effective methods.

Fourthly, the Organization should play a more prominent role in technical cooperation as a means of achieving its aims, bearing in mind the needs and priorities of the developing countries, enhancing national capabilities and consolidating local infrastructure so that full benefit can be drawn from the various programmes.

Fifthly, the Organization should attach special importance to the creation of employment opportunities and the expansion of full and productive employment, while guaranteeing workers' rights and eliminating all forms of discrimination or prejudice against them.

Sixthly, we agree with the proposals in the Director-General's Report regarding the preparation of an annual report on economic developments and their social impact on the world of work and its problems, and the inclusion of a permanent item on the Conference agenda dealing with problems of wages and standards of living so as to keep abreast of developments in working conditions and related problems and to adopt appropriate and effective action to raise the standard of living of millions of people.

Lastly, we reaffirm the importance of cooperation between the social partners in combating employment agencies and private employment offices that persist in exploiting and deceiving workers, usurping their means through false promises.

The Charter of the United Nations provided for the taking of joint action to curb aggression and promote the peaceful settlement of international disputes and conflicts. In addition, the Organization's Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia call for the protection of human rights and freedoms. But in spite of that, a regime that enjoys membership of this Organization has made aggression a means for achieving its ambitions, destroying and polluting the working environment. Moreover, for the past four years it has detained a number of missing persons and hostages of Kuwaiti and other nationalities in its prisons, including a number of trade unionists. No international body is allowed to investigate the distressing circumstances in which they are held, in violation of international resolutions and the resolutions of the Security Council.

In conclusion, I pray that God may help us to provide for the welfare and progress of our peoples and I hope that the Organization will continue in the future to stand forth as a banner of freedom, a symbol of prosperity, a defender of social justice and a promotor of world peace and prosperity.

May the peace, the mercy and the blessing of God be upon you.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Worker's delegate, New Zealand) – On behalf of the Workers' delegation from New Zealand, I would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election and wish them success in their terms of office.

This is an important session of the Conference in the life of the ILO. It is an anniversary year, and there are always opportunities not only to celebrate the achievements of the past, but also to affirm the very values that motivated those visionaries of the earlier age to set up the Organization in the first place.

The central organization of workers in New Zealand is a strong supporter of the three fundamental beliefs that have shaped the contribution that the ILO has made to improving the lives of working people around the world.

These beliefs are: that the laws and practices that determine how labour is employed must reflect the fact that labour is not a commodity; that there is virtue in having conditions of employment determined through a process of collective bargaining; and that tripartite processes of consultation produce a fairer and more stable social, economic and industrial order.

It is with sadness and regret that I must report that those beliefs are not shared by the Government of New Zealand and by the central organization of employers in our country.

They have engaged in a comprehensive and sustained attack, not only on the concepts, but on the ILO itself. The language they have used has been extreme and derogatory. Phrases such as the ILO being a geriatric organization, a bloated bureaucracy, a blot on the economic landscape, using Stalinist methods and of being a Kangaroo Court have been bandied about in the news media in New Zealand.

The two bodies have attacked the messenger in order to discredit the message. In the course of doing so, they have brought discredit on themselves, but the attacks continue.

This would be an internal family squabble of no major relevance to the business of this session of the Conference and not deserving of the time and attention of delegates at it, if it were simply a matter that was confined to New Zealand politics and politicking.

The reason that I raise the matter today, though, is that I detect in New Zealand the embryo of an employer movement, supported perhaps by reactionary governments in some parts of the world, that does seek to destroy the messages of the dignity and the humanity of labour, that does seek to end tripartism and that does seek to undermine the collective expressions of workers' interests, not by tackling the arguments directly, but by attacking this Organization as the champion of those values.

My plea is that, in celebrating the achievements of the last three-quarters of a century, the delegates to this session of the Conference affirm the basic tenets that motivate and justify a tripartite and international forum on employment rights, and seek to find ways of giving expression to those tenets in the context of the conditions that governments, employers and workers face as they move into the next century.

There is, in New Zealand, and in an increasing number of countries around the world, a view that it is possible to reconstruct economic performance through a denial of the collective rights of workers and, by that, through an extension of the authority of management.

Authoritarian management, like authoritarian government, is no basis for long-term progress. It can and does generate short-term cost savings, specifically at the expense of the workers. It does not and cannot sustain the sort of productivity and quality gains that are needed to maintain international competitiveness in a world of rapid change.

That is certainly the experience of workers from the New Zealand experiment. I would like to suggest that, as it faces the challenges of the next 75 years, the ILO will need to marry the imperatives of good labour practice with those of sound economic development.

Increasingly, it is not good enough to see workers' rights as something that is tacked on to, or funded out of, economic development. In that environment, workers' rights will always be the loser, always something that has to be afforded in the future. They are now under attack in my country because there is not the perception within the Government that sustainable development depends on and reinforces fairness in both the creation and the distribution of wealth.

The mission of the ILO in the decades ahead is to cement in that perception as the main expression of its values.

The second challenge for the years ahead is to recognize that the world trade order will be changing as a result of the recent GATT settlement. This will create new challenges to the ILO to resist new trade wars being fought, using workers' conditions as the ammunition.

There is an opportunity within GATT to actually extend respect for labour standards and the influence of the ILO. If it is possible to mobilize support for the so-called social clause to be inserted into GATT rules and mechanisms, then respect for basic labour Conventions, standards and processes can actually become the new standard by which countries engage in world trade. That is the agenda for the next phase of the ILO's operation.

There is an offensive being waged to limit the influence of international opinion on the labour practices of individual countries. We feel the effects of that offensive acutely in New Zealand.

There is an offensive being waged to abandon tripartism as an instrument of governance. We have felt the effects of that in New Zealand.

There is an offensive to sideline collective organizations in bargaining over the terms on which labour is engaged in production. We are resisting the effects of that in New Zealand.

Now, I fear that those who started those offensives wish to extend them, and this session of the Conference will become the next theatre of that conflict. The best resistance to those offensives is not to combat them on the basis of the record of the past – as honourable and impressive as that record may be – it is to forge the agenda for the future by fusing respect for labour and the constructive contribution of collectivism and tripartism as the most effective and equitable ways to build a better world in the new conditions of technology, trade and democracy.

The Declaration of Philadelphia heralded a significant advance for workers' rights and for the prestige of the ILO itself.

In conclusion, I wish, on behalf of the New Zealand labour movement, to salute those participants of 50 years ago, and to note with pride the contribution made by the President of the International Labour Conference in Philadelphia, Mr. Nash, humanitarian statesman and politician, Government member from New Zealand at that session of the Conference.

With that vision, we look forward to the celebration of the achievements of the next 75 years of the ILO and, in doing so, pledge the support of the central organization of workers in New Zealand to the Governing Body, to the Director-General and his staff in working to realize it.

Original French: Mr. LAICHOUBI (Minister of Labour and Social Protection, Algeria) – First, on behalf of the Algerian delegation, may I sincerely congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am sure his wisdom and experience will permit our debates to achieve the success expected of them.

I would also like to offer warm and friendly greetings to all delegates at this session at which we can celebrate together the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

How can we contribute to the celebration of this solemn moment other than by personally reaffirming our faith and our commitment to the principles and fundamental values on which the ILO was founded – principles and values which are just as relevant now at the end of this century.

How else can we celebrate than by looking at how our Organization can and must act with greater vigour and exert greater pressure to implement its noble ideals in a world which is undergoing profound upheaval in the rapid and vast changes brought about, in particular, by globalization of the economy: a world still faced with the immense challenges of combating poverty, unemployment and social exclusion.

Faced with all this, the ILO needs once again to repeat history and carefully re-examine its activities so that it can adopt new and certainly more appropriate approaches to promoting its role in the service of economic progress and social justice.

This year, once again, Mr. Hansenne, the ILO Director-General has not failed in his choice; he has foreseen our concerns and, in the outstanding Report he has presented to us, has called upon us to discuss and rethink the direction of future ILO activities. May I thank him warmly for the calibre of his analysis and the relevance of his proposals which will certainly greatly help the Conference in adopting effective lines of action for the future.

The ILO has every right to be proud of the positive record of past achievements it has placed before us today. Confirmation of this is to be found, in particular, in its standards-setting and other extensive attainments.

Who can deny that the universality of its standards, its special tripartite structure and the originality of its supervisory machinery have been decisive in its successes which have endowed it with an image which is both reassuring and full of humanism.

Rich in experience and blessed with such strengths, the ILO's excellent contribution to public discussion of the economic and social aspects of structural adjustment should, in our view, be pursued with even more tenacity, in cooperation with the other international and regional institutions, particularly those with economic, monetary and financial responsibilities, to ensure broader awareness of the interdependence between economic efficiency, the success of economic reform programmes, and social protection. In this respect, the World Summit for Social Development will provide further opportunity for consolidating this activity.

The specific ILO action proposals put forward by the Director-General in this respect are, we feel, fully appropriate and likely to give an even more vigorous impulse to international solidarity and thus mobilize more resources for economic and social development.

We would like, on this point, to emphasize how important it is for the ILO, given its specific mission, to promote a sound assessment of the problems and constraints implicit in the periods through which are living countries that, like Algeria, have entered into a process of profound economic change.

In the truly difficult situation with which it is faced, my country has committed itself to a programme of large-scale structural reform. Not only aiming to restimulate economic growth, it is also striving to reduce social antagonism through appropriate policies. For this reason and because it is crucial for Algeria, "concertation" and "dialogue" have been raised to the stature of principles in the legislation enabling economic and social restructuring.

The same approach of dialogue and concertation has been put into effect in the political arena. There can be no denying that overcoming these difficulties will be an even more painful process. However, faced with this difficulty, we still believe that wisdom and dialogue are the ways to set aside violence. Our response to this pain is the hope that we can come back from managing illusions to managing realities.

Taking the example set by other countries, Algeria has convened a conference of national dialogue.

Progressing along the hard path taken by various southern European countries in passing from a rigid and monolithic system to a multiple and democratic environment is a complex process. It is necessary to mobilize public opinion and then form it for this purpose, and it requires a collective intelligence guided by a common reference to the culture of concertation.

Here, and in contrast to the political arena which may sometimes go off course – the world of work can offer this example of dialogue and concertation.

Tripartism has constantly strengthened and consolidated itself by the various reforms that have been undertaken. Persistent social concertation with all the social partners has led to important agreements and opened the way to the recent adoption of new, and new dimensions of, social protection provisions in our country which establish unemployment insurance and early retirement systems to help workers who have lost their jobs for economic reasons.

Similarly, and here we share the views of the Director-General, society has to look after all its members and special measures providing State solidarity, assistance and support must be taken for the poorest and most vulnerable populations, including programmes to combat marginalization and social exclusion.

Furthermore, along the lines of new labour legislation which makes freely organized collective bargaining between the social partners a central instrument for regulating industrial regulations, the efforts are being made to guarantee that social dialogue can take place efficiently and on a long-term basis, thanks to suitable and lasting structures.

The establishment of a national, Economic and Social Council and the ratification by my country of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) are the first visible evidence of this.

The continuous amendment of the national system of industrial and labour relations, focusing on an essential concern for improving the performance of the means of production and helping to create jobs, remains a priority task.

Although we sincerely welcome the range of ILO action, we would like it to be more daring and dynamic in giving form to this new approach in the field of cooperation and technical assistance. In particular, the ILO will have to improve its support for our programme of reform and economic restructuring.

Finally, as duty dictates, we must stress the exemplary contribution continually made by the ILO to the elimination of apartheid in South Africa and which, furthermore, has helped this great African country to return to our fold.

On behalf of Algeria, I would like solemnly to welcome the results of the three multiracial elections that have just taken place there and which have brought the great proponent of peace, Mr. Nelson Mandela, to the post of head of State.

We must also recognize the unceasing efforts that the ILO has made to help the workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories.

Original French: Mr. MATINCHEV (Deputy Prime Minister, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Bulgaria) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election to this high post of the session of the Conference which is taking place on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the establishment of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

We are going to discuss serious problems which have been causing concern for quite some time for all the countries of the world represented at this session of the Conference by national tripartite delegations. The Report of the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, is a successful attempt to retrace the new conditions in which the ILO has to work to ensure respect for the values and the ideals formulated in its Constitution. The Report underlines the need to be aware of our responsibility for the future of the world of labour in the years to come. By shouldering this responsibility we must pinpoint past omissions and make the necessary changes to consolidate the Organization at the threshold of the twenty-first century. For quite some years, the Governing Body of the ILO, as well as the sessions of the Conference, have been examining the need for structural changes within the Organization itself, for reorganization on a new basis of interaction between the standard-setting activities and technical cooperation, and for implementation of the policy of active partnership. Efforts in this field are part and parcel of the general process of reform in the United Nations system and should be supported.

Several countries, including Bulgaria, are in the throes of a complicated transition to a market economy and democracy. The challenges facing these countries are very difficult and vary from case to case, although when comparing them, common trends can also be seen. As with most of these countries, Bulgaria is experiencing an economic and social crisis. The restrictive measures we have undertaken since the very beginning of our reforms for the purpose of macroeconomic and monetary stabilization so far have not produced the results we had hoped for.

In 1993 inflation was brought down to 63.9 per cent, which is 16 points below the year before. Inflation has affected wages, pensions, benefits and all types of social assistance. In 1993 the unemployment rate reached 16.8 per cent and has remained at that level in 1994.

The Government is making great efforts to stabilize the economy and to establish the necessary preconditions for economic growth. These actions centre on: speeding up privatization and structural reform; controlling inflation and protecting the real income of the population; and fighting unemployment and poverty.

In order to correct negative economic trends, in 1994 the Government will continue its restrictive economic policy, while respecting the agreements signed with international financial institutions. This inevitably calls for an incomes policy able to protect the population's real income and keep them around the levels we reached in the second half of 1992.

In brief, the situation in our country over the last 16 months clearly highlights that the problems of restructuring in Bulgaria still exist and that the debate on labour standards and their relationship with development is not merely theoretical.

We are fully aware of the need to strengthen the potential of the Organization with regard to technical cooperation and research which could help the ILO to assume a leading role in preparing an international social policy.

We are ready to support such initiatives in this field, either by the ILO or any other member States.

With regard to the active partnership policy carried out in recent years, I would like to point with satisfaction to the particularly successful work of the multidisciplinary team in Budapest studying conditions for social reform in Bulgaria. We are most grateful also to several departments of the ILO which have helped the Bulgarian Government to establish priorities among the country's social objectives. I should like especially to stress the activities of the Social Security Department and its Director, Mr. Gillion, which has made a great contribution to the preparation of a white paper on pension schemes and to thank all those who worked on it. This white paper was welcomed at the summit of the Group of Twenty-Four held in Sofia on 16 and 17 May 1994. In the last year, Bulgaria has cooperated closely with the ILO and the Organization's influence in our country has increased. In spite of all the difficulties in the field of social dialogue at this particular moment due to the inflexible and politicized position of certain social partners I would very much like to express my personal conviction that, thanks to assistance from the ILO, the quality of social dialogue will attain a new and higher level. We could thus guarantee all social partners the chance to take on responsibility for establishing a consensus which will improve the situation throughout Bulgaria.

To conclude, I would like to reply quite openly to the appeal launched by the Director-General and confirm the will of the Government of Bulgaria to make social justice one of its and the ILO's policy priorities and declare our commitment to active tripartism as a vehicle for democratization and reform and our desire to help the Organization as far as we can to enable it to change and adapt to future challenges.

In point of fact we are living in very interesting times, perhaps even the most interesting since the establishment of the ILO.

Original Spanish: Mr. CARO FIGUEROA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Argentina) – Before looking at the issues I consider to be of interest, allow me to begin by congratulating the President of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference on his appointment and to say that it is an honour for me to represent the Government of the Republic of Argentina and to be able to communicate with those who are shouldering the greatest responsibilities as far as employment and labour relations are concerned, in practically the whole planet.

The 81st Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place in a certainly unique context. First of all, the growing unemployment affects the great majority of the countries represented here, and threatens to destroy delicate and vital social balances. Our citizens are witnessing the advance of the looming spectre of unemployment, even independently of the economic cycle, which is a disturbing and distinctive sign of the current situation. The fact that unemployment is increasing whilst the economy is growing is a challenge for which, at least to date, neither those responsible for national policies nor the social partners have found a satisfactory answer. Secondly, the globalization of the economy brings to unknown extremes the strategies of nations and their enterprises to reach new and greater competitive advantages. The permanent search for ways to strengthen the competitiveness of economies puts into question the nature of labour relations and the welfare provisions in each of our countries. Thirdly, the recurrent threats to freedom of association which, in new forms, attempt to restrict a fundamental social right. Indeed, in various countries freedom of association appears threatened by management techniques which try to eradicate trade unions, or at least to remove them from the sphere of the enterprise, and also by trade union practices which aspire to consolidate monopolies and refuse to recognize the workers' right to organize.

In short, the explosive combination of growing unemployment, competitive challenge and constraints on freedom of association threatens the foundations of the democratic model of labour relations which based on age-old values has been upheld by the International Labour Organization since its inception.

As opposed to what simplified reasoning may advise the maintaining of age-old dogmas and routines which advocate the fossilizing of standards, institutions and behaviour characteristic of labour relations systems can only serve to multiply the effects of that explosive combination. This is why the Argentinian Government is firmly convinced that only an extensive process of labour and social reform can preserve the prevailing values of freedom, justice, dignity at work and of workers, solidarity and cooperative dialogue between the social partners. It is equally convinced that this process of reform must also be carried out at the same intensity within the scope of the International Labour Organization, which has undoubtedly played an important role in the post-war world, characterized by protectionism and autarchy, defending freedom of association and basic ethics in labour relations.

Faced with those who question the future of this Organization in the name of extreme liberalism, the Argentinian Government believes that the ILO has a new and important role to play in this world which is moving towards more extensive forms of integration. But it is of the opinion also that the Organization can only fulfil this role if it is able to renew itself, revise instruments, transform its internal culture, decentralize, overcome bureaucratic temptations and reject ideological dogmatism. That is to say, only if it is able to confront a process which some specialists have started to call "re-engineering".

It is necessary that in this very forum we discuss the rigidity and flexibility of labour systems without complexes or prejudices. Not only as regards each national system, but also as regards the instruments produced by the ILO to govern its individual relationships and specific working conditions.

The ILO, as part of this process of reform which has no doubt already begun and which is promoted by the Director-General himself in the important Report which he has submitted to this Conference, must face the arduous problem of social dumping which so damages the values we wish to preserve. The ILO must do this, not with generic, well-intended statements, at least not only with those, but also by reflecting the reasonable concerns of workers, employers and governments, and the experience of regional undertakings.

The Republic of Argentina does not base its competitive strategy on the practice of social dumping. In this respect it sympathizes with, and deems positive all efforts made to find an effective, multilateral, global solution to the problem of social dumping. The participation of the ILO in this task is essential for us.

I would like to dedicate the last minutes of my speech to a very rapid summary of the socio-labour situation in the Republic of Argentina. The economy of my country, which has been growing at rates over 6 per cent for the past three years and which has created net employment at rates close to 1.5 per cent per annum is, however, suffering from a sudden increase in unemployment.

A very marked deficit with respect to vocational training, a result of many years of lack of attention and lack of public and private investment, is another factor peculiar to Argentina. It is a very disturbing deficit which has much to do with some of the problems that we are currently experiencing in the fields of employment and productivity.

Consistent indications which flag important changes in the structure of collective bargaining are the third of the Argentinian characteristics to highlight. Although some stagnant areas remain, in the past months progress has been made towards decentralization and the updating of negotiated agreements. The enterprise as a unit of negotiation and private activities is at the forefront of this process of modernization.

In view of all this, the Government has adopted economic and labour measures in an attempt to halt unemployment, promote public and private investment in training activities and to support decentralization which is the driving force behind collective independence per se.

However, there is a comprehensive labour reform pending which while maintaining values and essential equilibria in a democratic model of labour relations, places the Argentinian system in a position to face up to the challenges of these new times.

To reach this objective, protect employment, equality and solidarity, the Government of Argentina has placed its trust in social dialogue which although it has not yet produced specific agreements, in recent weeks appears to have re-established this dialogue fruitfully and positively.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MENDOZA) – Before we adjourn, I give the floor to the Government delegation of Iraq for a right of reply to the statement made by the Government delegate of Kuwait.

Original Arabic: Mr. JASSIM (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Iraq) – The head of the delegation of Kuwait has criticized my country. He referred to prisoners and hostages, while it is obvious that there are no prisoners or hostages. On the contrary, an embargo has been placed on my country and has resulted in thousands of victims; an unjust embargo that some persons are trying to justify by saying that there are prisoners. In fact, our country has always been willing to open dialogue to lift the embargo; and that is why I denounce everything that has been said as pure and simple lies.

Sixth (special) sitting

Thursday, 9 June 1994, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Gray

ADDRESS BY MR. BOUTROS BOUTROS-GHALI, SECRETARY-GENERAL OF THE UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION

The PRESIDENT – It is a great honour for me to open this special sitting of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to invite the Secretary-General of the Conference, Mr. Michel Hansenne, to introduce our distinguished speaker, Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, Secretary-General of the United Nations.

Original French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL OF THE CONFERENCE – Mr. Secretary-General, as you know, we are celebrating our 75th anniversary this year. The assembly gathered here is aware that next year the United Nations Organization will be celebrating its 50th anniversary. So we have lived side by side for 50 years. In spite of that, this is the very first time that our Conference has had the honour and the pleasure of welcoming the Secretary-General of the United Nations. It goes without saying how honoured we are and how much we would like to thank you for attending this special sitting. Your presence here first of all shows your commitment to the work of the International Labour Organization, in the course of which you have in the past lent your expertise through substantial contributions to the work of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

Your presence, however, is particularly important now at this 75th anniversary, especially in terms of our future role and activities in the United Nations system and within the international community.

In your important document, An agenda for peace, and the supplementary report, An agenda for development, you underlined your ever-present concern that only close cooperation between the different United Nations agencies, encompassing economic, social, cultural and humanitarian problems, could ensure lasting peace. You may rest assured that our Organization above all shares your concern. I am convinced that our goal of social justice can only be reached through a more integrated approach with other United Nations agencies.

Social progress cannot be achieved as separate from economic and financial policies, and as you have often stressed, must be a key element in respect for human rights.

Against the backdrop of the major geopolitical upheavals we are witnessing today, our Organization, like the rest of the United Nations system, is being approached more and more by the international community. Public opinion is questioning our ability to meet the great challenges before us and is calling for increased action and commitment on the part of international institutions.

In this context, your personal commitment and your encouragement for greater integration in terms of the work and responsabilities of United Nations agencies will, I am sure, help us adequately to rise to these challenges.

On behalf of the delegates here, I would like to thank you once again for joining us and tell you how impatiently we look forward to hearing your message to us.

Original French: Mr. BOUTROS-GHALI, (Secretary-General of the United Nations Organisation) – Allow me, first of all, to express my deep gratitude to you for this invitation to address your assembly and to celebrate with you the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization.

I regard this invitation as a great honour, not only for myself but for the United Nations as a whole. The United Nations system knows how much it owes to your distinguished Organization and pays tribute to your seniority and to the model you have thus provided for many other specialized agencies.

Every anniversary, as we know, is an invitation to take stock and to outline future prospects. For me, it is also a unique opportunity to bear witness to the close ties between the International Labour Organization and the United Nations.

There is nothing surprising in this. Indeed, in its preamble, the Charter of the United Nations expresses the wish of "the peoples of the United Nations" to "promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom".

This social concern, expressed in the opening sentences of the founding document of the United Nations, constitutes one of the guiding principles of the United Nations and explains our common concerns.

But I am also aware that, in its own area, the seniority of the International Labour Organization to the United Nations itself is beyond dispute. Twenty-five years before the San Francisco Charter, the International Labour Organization had already brought social justice to the forefront of the concerns of the international community.

During the difficult period of the League of Nations, the ILO accomplished a body of work whose foresightedness deserves our profound admiration even today. Both in its structure and in its objectives, the International Labour Organization quickly showed that the foundation of international society should be, first and last, the well-being and the security of the human person.

The Second World War, far from discouraging that enterprise, set in train an unprecedented process of rethinking in the social sphere; and the Declaration of Philadelphia – which in 1944 reformulated and renewed the principles of the ILO – is remarkable both for the broad sweep of its views and for its surprising modernity. In every line of that text, the objective of social justice is affirmed.

For the first time, an international organization had the boldness to declare, in a formal text, the primacy of the social sphere.

For the first time, an international organization made clear the link between peace and development. And for the first time, an international organization explicitly declared that poverty, where it exists, constitutes a danger to the prosperity of all.

Let this anniversary, therefore, also provide us with an opportunity to re-read the Declaration of Philadelphia. There we shall find, at all levels, the principles and the ethics to guide our actions.

Today, however, we must carry out those actions in a world radically different from the one that existed in the aftermath of the Second World War. In 50 years, mankind has experienced upheavals unprecedented both in their intensity and in their rapidity. From the emergence of the countries of the Third World to the end of communism; from the antagonism between East and West to the worldwide market economy; from the euphoria of growth to the anguish of crisis, this second half of the twentieth century has been a time of convulsions and shocks.

Today the world, still stunned by this sudden and brutal acceleration of history, has seen the collapse of most of its traditional landmarks and of its most firmly anchored certainties. We have entered an era of uncertainty – uncertainty about the values that serve as the basis for our common destiny, uncertainty about the institutions which structure our social life and uncertainty about technological developments.

Accordingly in every society, regardless of its level of development, whatever its traditions, there is now a vague feeling of fear of what is to come, fear of making a commitment to an inscrutable future.

This situation, as we well know, is not without danger. Wars, exclusions, hatreds, antagonisms (ethnical or religious ones) always feed on such a climate. And irrational and fanatical thoughts always lie in wait to offer false solutions to worried and distressed people.

It is therefore the inescapable obligation of all of us in the United Nations system not only to re-think the basis of international life, the new social contract, but also to offer to States and nations, to men and women real reasons – real reasons for hope.

This task assigned to us by history compels us first of all to make a hard-headed analysis of what we are as international institutions. And we cannot, in this latter part of the twentieth century, avoid asking ourselves some crucial questions: Can our international organizations solve the fundamental problems confronting our societies? Is the United Nations system well adapted to the new world opening up before us? Are we still worthy of the trust of the international community?

Albert Thomas, one of the founding fathers of the International Labour Office, had, from the very beginning established a principle that may serve as an initial reply to these questions. "An international organization", he prophesied, "should always be an institutional solution to a problem of solidarity." And that is exactly what we are concerned with today: How can we envisage, and ensure the effectiveness of, new forms of solidarity that the world needs?

If I have chosen to begin my statement with these basic questions, it is because I am convinced, as you are, that the world is experiencing an unprecedented social and structural crisis. While there has been indisputable progress, social problems remain critical throughout the world. Poverty is increasing, in particular in the developing countries. The overall growth of unemployment and the spread of social malaise have given rise to new forms of tension that in many ways threaten international peace and security.

This new and disturbing situation requires us to make radical changes in our ways of thinking and acting. This is true both for the International Labour Organization and the United Nations.

We are all aware that, for 75 years the International Labour Organization has endeavoured to promote the rights of workers throughout the world. The conventions and recommendations that originated in its bodies have made it possible to establish international labour standards in such areas as freedom of association, remuneration, working hours and working conditions, compensation for job-related accidents, social security, paid leave, industrial safety, employment services, and many others.

Today, however, we face new constraints since we must not only protect those who have jobs but also help to alleviate the fate of those who do not. Those without work deserve as much attention as workers themselves, since the right to work is an essential component of human dignity, and we must guarantee that right. This demonstrates the extent to which the critical employment situation throughout the world is a permanent reproach to all our societies.

Of course, there are no miracle solutions in this area. However, if we fail to see that work is the primary element of social integration, then, inevitably, we are accepting the unacceptable. We are accepting that the societies in which we live are unjust and unfair, and create mechanisms of exclusion.

A general thinking of the question of employment is therefore essential. Yet this contradicts most of our traditional ways of thinking: How are we to envisage access to jobs in an uncertain and unbalanced market? How are we to envisage the relocation of jobs in a global economy? How are we globalized to envisage the time and even the form work takes in societies caught up in radical changes?

That is, without a doubt, one of the most pressing tasks facing the International Labour Organization three-quarters of a century after its founding.

For its part, the United Nations must do some serious soul-searching if it wishes to meet the social challenge that history has given it.

I have already said on many occasions that, to my mind, the development imperative is as much a priority for the United Nations as the imperative of peace. Very often, international public opinion and the media emphasize only the Organization's role in the maintenance of international peace and security. I therefore wish once again to reaffirm the very important place that economic and social concerns occupy in United Nations structures, activities and services.

Since my election to the post of Secretary-General of the United Nations, I have always considered the development imperative to be one of my main objectives, and it is with this in mind that I began, as soon as I took office, an in-depth reform of the Organization in the economic and social fields. Like you, I am convinced that the structure of an international organization should reflect, as much as possible, the activities for which it is responsible. An institution should be made in the image of the goals that it pursues, and I intend to broaden this process of continuous adaptation.

It was in this same spirit that I have just issued An agenda for development for consideration by the General Assembly. With this text, I wish to encourage member States of the United Nations to begin an in-depth re-thinking of the Organzation's role in assisting developing countries.

This is an opportunity for me to point out that, far from being separate or conflicting objectives, peace and development are inseparable from each other for, just as there can be no sustainable development without peace, there can also be no real peace without development.

But now we must go much further than this peace development dialectic, for the issue of development extends beyond the narrow framework of North-South relations, and affects the entire world, regardless of the economic circumstances of States and of the peoples on this planet.

Today, we must together lay down a new social pact for the whole world. We must devise and promote social development for the world. I believe that this is the goal that the World Summit, to be held in Copenhagen in March 1995, must set for itself.

I see the Copenhagen Summit as a cornerstone in the building of a new social edifice by the United Nations system. Since the Rio de Janeiro Summit on Environment and Development, held in June 1992, the United Nations has been engaged in an unprecedented process of forward-looking thinking. At Rio, political leaders from all over the world and international public opinion were able, not only to assess the importance of environmental factors for the future of the planet, but also to outline a new sustainable development programme to ensure the well-being of humanity as a whole.

What took place then, was what I regard as one of the first major processes of international deliberations on our collective future.

I expect the Cairo Conference on Population and Development, which is to be held next September, and the Beijing Conference on Women, to continue and expand this major social project.

However, there is no question that it will be at Copenhagen, on the very occasion when we shall be celebrating the 50th anniversary of the United Nations, that we shall be called upon to develop, together, the new social project on which I set such store.

I say "together" because the World Summit for Social Development calls for close collaboration between the International Labour Organization and the United Nations.

Already, the International Labour Organization has played a fundamental role in the preparatory process for the Summit. The Preparatory Committee for the Summit has thus benefited from your Organization's unparalleled experience, particularly with regard to the scale and the social implications of the changes taking place in the world.

I also have high expectations of the International Labour Organization, as far as the follow-up to the Summit is concerned. In particular, the Summit should provide an opportunity to set up international machinery to monitor, evaluate and analyze new social trends and the situations worldwide. The Summit should also be a forum for strengthening international cooperation and proposing integrated economic and social policy.

In all these fields, I hope that the International Labour Organization will deploy its full strength. Since its general mandate is to promote social justice, it is right and proper that it should be given a leading role in implementing the recommendations and programme of action which will be drawn up at the Copenhagen Summit.

As you know, the purpose of the World Summit for Social Development is to formulate policies and measures to alleviate and reduce poverty, to expand productive employment and to enhance social integration.

Above and beyond these specific objectives, the goal will be to state loud and clear the need to redirect social policy worldwide. This is a new and far-reaching undertaking: it amounts to saying that without social development there can be no genuine economic development.

Yes, social development is one of the most crucial issues we face as we approach the end of the century. If we are to develop, if not a principle, then at least a general approach to the subject, we must understand that social development has both national and international dimensions. In considering this topic, we must therefore take as a basis the principle of subsidiarity and reaffirm that it is not for the United Nations system to dictate to members of the international community, or in their stead, the kinds of social benefits to be provided to individuals or to their communities. But we must also say forcefully, that there are in the social field issues that have an unquestionable international dimension. Indeed, in the last analysis, certain principles of solidarity can be invoked only in an international context.

This promotion of people-oriented development should now be our objective.

In a world where competition will play an increasingly restricting role, the imperative of greater solidarity must guide the development process and counterbalance the self-interest of nations.

At Copenhagen we should say that, while the promise of continual growth and of a fairer distribution of resources holds out hope for most people, it may however be fraught with exclusion if those who are unable to participate because they have been born poor, are destitute or are marginalized, are overlooked.

We should also restate our belief that the individual can develop only when there is an explicit recognition of his or her multiple affiliations, which ranges from identification with the family, the neighbourhood, the village, the urban community and the nation, to an awareness, as yet confined to a few, of world citizenship. Contemporary society, however, creates social and economic situations which disrupt these traditional reference systems. As a result, conditions have emerged and are developing which make for the increased vulnerability of individuals, who are caught up in a spiral of marginalization and exclusion.

There can therefore be no genuinely people-oriented development unless all the factors which make for vulnerability are taken into account, in other words unless a participatory pattern of development is introduced and unless development is placed in the context of a social project that aims to promote the development of all people.

Together we must work to ensure that each individual is genuinely empowered to shape his or her own destiny.

This is, as I see it, the meaning of participatory development, which will empower populations, local communities, towns and nations to become genuine actors in the economic and social spheres.

Social development of this kind, based on the principle of solidarity, must be driven by two constant concerns: redistribution and integration.

The promotion of the idea of redistribution is a matter of equity. Our thinking about this issue must not be naive. We all know that redistribution does not simply mean transferring a share of existing international benefits, whether large or small, to the most disadvantaged members of society. We are all aware that there can be non-productive transfers that may actually reduce the amount of the wealth to be reapportioned.

Transfers must therefore be accompanied by an increase in production, because the bigger the pie to be shared, the bigger the pieces to be distributed.

Of course, direct action – I would go so far as to say urgent action – needs to be taken on behalf of the most disadvantaged. But at the same time, we must promote action that is more general in scope whose primary purpose is to increase the available wealth, whose ultimate result will be to bring indirect benefits to the disadvantaged. That is an important idea which must inform our thinking about social development and the methods to be employed for the purpose of redistribution.

Many States, in the domestic sphere, have made the intellectual journey which I have just outlined. I believe it is important that this idea of redistribution should now be thought through on a worldwide scale.

Our concern at Copenhagen will also be to promote integration. As I have already said, intolerable situations of exclusion in the social sphere are increasing in an alarming way. In this area, employment is an essential factor of integration. Conversely, unemployment is a form of exclusion which often brings with it the whole array of social handicaps.

Here we have a vast field for research, research that is especially urgent given the great expectations of the women and men who are affected by the situation. We must, however, recognize that the information we have on trends in employment and long-term unemployment is very sketchy and that our thinking on the various forms of underemployment must be further developed. Is it possible to promote patterns of growth that generate greater numbers of jobs? Can rural employment be developed on a larger scale? What can be done to replace obsolete industrial activities? These are a few of the areas for research that we ought to explore.

In thinking about these issues, we must keep in mind that the factor most conducive to integration is still, as far as the individual is concerned, the sense of belonging. I am convinced that the fundamental weakness of hard-line liberal thought is its refusal to take this idea into account. The liberal model is concerned only with the juxtaposition of individuals, without specifying the various affiliations which those individuals have. The advantage of an examination of these issues in an international forum would be to affirm the existence of multiple affiliations at various levels.

Indeed, social development must be anchored in the notion of belonging or affiliation, provided, of course, that belonging is viewed in terms of the dimension of welcoming and openness, and provided that we come to see belonging as the opposite of anathema and exclusion!

It is quite natural that responsibility for putting forward final proposals rests with the heads of State and Government when they meet in Copenhagen.

But I should like to state here and now that the United Nations system, and first and foremost the International Labour Organization and the United Nations itself, already consider that they are fully mobilized for this new social project. The international organizations were indeed established to serve as a channel for the views of States, but they were also established to listen to the appeals of the world's peoples.

In joining with you in observing the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, I should therefore like to express my hope that the words and the deeds to which our deliberations give rise will reflect the idea of social innovation.

Today we have the task of reinventing a new mode of life in our societies. Men and women the world over expect it of us. We have a duty to show ourselves to be worthy of their expectations.

I know that the United Nations system as a whole can count on the International Labour Organization in this exciting endeavour.

The PRESIDENT – Mr. Secretary-General, I believe I can speak in the name of all the delegates to this historic Conference in extending our heartfelt thanks to you for your thought-provoking speech and for taking the time from your busy schedule to honour us with your presence to mark the ILO's 75th anniversary.

Many of the points you have raised once again underscore the continued relevance of the ILO's Constitution and of the Declaration of Philadelphia, even though these documents were drafted 75 and 50 years ago respectively. The ILO is proud to be a member of the United Nations family and we are prepared to play an active role in fighting poverty, creating employment, protecting the rights of workers, promoting democracy and popular participation – in short, in building the foundations for sustainable human development. But this is also a unique opportunity to emphasize, as you have just done so eloquently, that the ILO is a unique organization within the United Nations family. We are the oldest organization in the system and with age comes experience and expertise. We are also unique because our constituent assembly – this Conference, our Governing Body – represents not only member States but also workers and employers.

This special network of constituents, coming from the public and private sectors and a broad cross-section of civil society, provides at the very least some guarantee that we speak not only in the name of the world's decision-makers, but also, and perhaps more importantly, in the name of those who feel the effects of those decisions. And it is the Workers' group's view that this vast reservoir of ILO talent remains relatively untapped by the United Nations and its other constituent bodies.

As we prepare the ILO's role in next year's World Summit for Social Development, we should bear in mind that human labour forms the basis for sustainable development. The active participation of the ILO's tripartite constituents in this decisive meeting would be one way to better utilize the ILO's creative energies. Such participation would also help demonstrate that the world's employers and workers are fully engaged in the fight against poverty, unemployment and social exclusion with a vision broader than their immediate sectoral interests.

However, I also feel that I can speak in the name of all of the ILO's tripartite constituents, and not solely the workers, in wholeheartedly supporting the view expressed in your Agenda for development that economic growth for its own sake is not enough. As you yourself say in this important document, economic growth should promote full employment and poverty reduction, and as the Declaration of Philadelphia points out, if we fail to alleviate poverty the future of the whole globe is in peril.

As we reflect on the role of the ILO within the United Nations family, let us recall that the danger posed by persistent and often growing poverty both to world peace and to domestic social peace is more acute than ever. The costs of not confronting poverty are much higher than the savings realized, both nationally and internationally, by decreasing social programmes targeted towards the poor.

Let us take a hard look at what the ILO could contribute to the fight against poverty. Our policy advice in this area will be based on practical experience. The old adage "seeing is believing" should be a guiding principle for the ILO's newly created multidisciplinary teams as they attempt to bring to our constituents not just good thoughts and policies but also practical hands-on solutions to improve the living and working conditions of the world's marginalized population. In other words, we must continually ask ourselves the simple question, Does our policy advice work in practice in the real world? And a second adage, this one perhaps a bit more American, should guide us all as we make the hard decisions that lie ahead on how to allocate or reallocate the scarce resources of the national and international institutions that we represent, and that put quite simply is: "Put your money where your mouth is."

Mr. Secretary-General of the United Nations, thank you once again for your inspiring address. In my capacity both as President of this Conference and as a member of the ILO Governing Body, I will spare no effort in ensuring that the ILO maintains and strengthens its operational capacity to contribute to sustainable development and the fight against poverty. This is in the interest of us all.

It is now my privilege to invite you, Sir, to sign the Livre d'or of this 75th anniversary Session of the International Labour Conference.

(The Secretary-General of the United Nations Organization signs the Livre d'or.)

International Labour Conference

Provisional Record 8

Eighty-first Session, Geneva, 1994

First report of the Credentials Committee

1. The Credentials Committee of the 81st Session of the Conference is composed of Mr. Trevor Spencer, Government delegate, Trinidad and Tobago, Chairman; Mr. Daniel Funes de Rioja, Employers' substitute delegate, Argentina; and Mr. Leroy Trotman, Workers' delegate, Barbados.

Composition of the Conference

2. Since the signing of the brief report made by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office (Provisional Record No. 4, p. 42-44), a number of modifications have occurred in the composition of the Conference.

3. The number of member States of the International Labour Organisation represented at the Conference is at present 157. To date 14 member States (Armenia, Chad, Djibouti, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Georgia, Guinea-Bissau, Kyrgyzstan, Rwanda, Saint-Lucia, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Turkmenistan, Yugoslavia) have not sent a delegation.

Accredited delegates and advisers

4. The total number of accredited delegates is 611, comprising 309 Government delegates, 151 Employers' delegates and 151 Workers' delegates.

5. There are 1583 accredited advisers, comprising 733 Government advisers, 381 Employers' advisers and 469 Workers' advisers.

6. The total number of accredited delegates and advisers is therefore 2194.

7. With regard to the resolution concerning the participation of women in ILO meetings, adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session in June 1981, the Credentials Committee wishes to inform the Conference that there are 66 women among the 611 delegates accredited to the Conference and 254 women among the 1583 accredited advisers. The total number of women accredited to the Conference is therefore 320 as against 282 last year.

Registered delegates and advisers

8. The following is the present situation concerning the registration of delegates, which (in accordance with practice, approved by this session of the Conference) is the basis for determining the quorum for voting.

9. At this time the number of registered delegates is 541, comprising 278 Government delegates, 131 Employers' delegates and 132 Workers' delegates.

10. In addition, the number of registered advisers is 1295, comprising 639 Government advisers, 281 Employers' advisers and 375 Workers' advisers.

Quorum

11. Thirty-five advisers, who are substitutes to delegates who have not registered, are taken into account in calculating the voting strength of the Conference.

12. Since 14 States[1] represented at the Conference are in arrears in the payment of their financial contributions to the Organisation so as to come within the terms of paragraph 4 of Article 13 of the Constitution, these States may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or in its committees. The 39 registered delegates designated by these States are hence not taken into consideration in fixing the quorum.

13. At the present time the quorum required to give a vote validity is 269.

14. The Committee notes that the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates would be 284. The difference between the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered and that which could have been calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates is due to the fact that some accredited delegates have not yet registered. The Committee urgently appeals to delegates present at the Conference to register so that the quorum will be as nearly exact as possible and that their presence can be taken into account in its calculation.

Incomplete delegations

15. The Committee notes that, at the present time, the delegations of six countries (Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cambodia, Comores, Haïti, Honduras and Liberia) are exclusively governmental. The Committee wishes to affirm once again the necessity for governments to comply with the requirement of Article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference. The Committee recalls that pursuant to a decision of the Governing Body, the Director-General each year requests the governments of all member States which did not send complete tripartite delegations to the Conference to indicate the reasons for their failure to do so, and that the information received in reply to that request is duly communicated to the Governing Body.

16. The Committee also notes that there is some imbalance between the number of advisers to the delegates of each group and also between the number of Employers' and Workers' advisers. It once again urges governments to take greater account, when nominating delegations, of the proportions in the composition of the Conference envisaged by paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution. The Committee further recalls the request contained in the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the International Labour Organisation, adopted by the Conference in 1971, and expresses the hope that Governments will accord equal treatment to each of the groups when appointing advisers to their country's delegation to the International Labour Conference. The Committee recalls in this connection the obligation of Members under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution, to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers and trusts that this obligation will be respected for the whole duration of the Conference.

Observers

17. In addition to the observer delegations, mentioned in the Brief Report of the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, an observer delegation from the Democratic People's Republic of Korea is attending the Conference.

[1] Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Cambodia, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Comores, Dominican Republic, Guinea, Haïti, Iraq, Liberia, Niger, Sierra Leone, Yemen.

Organizations and liberation movement invited

18. The Conference is also being attended by:

- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs invited by virtue of Article II, paragraph (1) - relating to reciprocal representation of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organization, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;
- representatives of specialized agencies and other official international organizations, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.
- representatives of non-governmental international organizations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organizations also invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of a liberation movement invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(k), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

19. A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

Objections[2]

20. To date, the Committee has before it a number of objections or communications concerning the credentials of certain delegates and advisers. It has forthwith commenced its examination. The Committee considers that its work has been facilitated by the presentation of a substantial number of credentials within the time limit provided for under Article 26, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders. It is also important that governments utilise the suggested form for credentials of delegates, enclosed with the letter of convocation and the Memorandum communicated to governments every year prior to the session of the Conference. In order to comply with article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution, it would be necessary that Governments provide exact information on the employers' and workers' organisations consulted in nominating Employers' and Workers' delegates and advisers as well as on the organisations which have agreed to such nominations.

21. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Geneva, 10 June 1994

(Signed)

T. SPENCER

CHAIRMAN | D. FUNES DE RIOJA | L. TROTMAN.

International Labour Conference

Provisional Record

Eighty-first Session, Geneva, 1994

Seventh sitting

Thursday, 9 June 1994, 11.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Gray

The PRESIDENT – We will now resume our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. KANERVA (Minister of Labour, Finland) – Allow me to present my congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of this Conference on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO. I am convinced that this Conference will be a success under his guidance.

I also wish to welcome the delegation of the Republic of South Africa. The transition of South Africa into a democratic multi-racial society through a peaceful election process is one of the major political achievements of recent years. It is important that the world community give its full support to the transition process in South Africa. The ILO has a role to play in many crucial areas.

The Director-General has provided us with an excellent report which deals with the present and future challenges facing the International Labour Organization. It is a good basis for our deliberations at this Conference.

The ongoing drastic changes in the world are described very much to the point in the Report. The indisputable success of the market economy and the globalization of the action of an increasing number of economic operators are, together with progress towards more representative forms of government, indicators of a development which offers possibilities as well as challenges.

Positive developments are, however, often overshadowed by persistent poverty. Such poverty is often related to unemployment or inferior working conditions and constitutes a root cause of extensive disturbances and violence that many regions are experiencing. Intensified efforts to remove such root causes are required in the common interest of all nations. There is every reason to recall the message of the Declaration of Philadelphia: "... lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice ..."

My Government is convinced of the need to base the ILO's activities on the principle of social justice also in the future. At the same time, the changing circumstances provide an opportunity to build a better ILO, a more effective instrument for helping to improve working and social conditions in the world.

Tripartite cooperation contributes – and this is borne out by our national experience – to achieving a mature and viable labour policy while ensuring the commitment of the parties to feasible reforms. This mood of cooperation naturally requires flexible relations between the various social parties, and the relevant procedures need to be adjusted to meet changing circumstances.

The Director-General has taken up the problem of international labour standards in the context of the need to develop ILO activities.

When drafting new labour standards and revising old ones, the objectives and most important aspects of the relevant subject areas should be brought into clear focus. Such an approach would contribute to rebuilding a base of consensus and international commitment in the spirit of the ILO's early years. The significance of international labour standards depends fundamentally on the global acceptance of the main principles embodied in them.

Fears exist in many countries that implementing international labour standards might affect competitiveness. The globalization of economic operations reinforces such apprehensions. Thus the time has come to explore new avenues. The Director-General has presented the idea of an international Convention, which would, in extreme cases, allow for the utilization of trade sanctions.

The proposal of the Director-General deserves to be carefully studied. Cross-sectoral sanctions would certainly be a novelty in the ILO. Such a Convention might also lead to unwanted consequences in terms of increased protectionism if the modalities were not carefully drafted.

I cannot close my statement at this Conference without again underlining the crucial issue of unemployment. It is obvious that far more effective measures are required at the global level in order to promote employment. Although the possibilities of the ILO are limited, it must intensify its efforts in this sector. This is why my delegation welcomes the active participation of the Organization in the preparatory work for the United Nations World Summit for Social Development. Considering the essential significance of employment and labour issues at that important summit meeting, my wish is that the ILO will keep up its excellent work and that its tripartite merits will be fully appreciated also in this context.

I also feel that the proposal made by the Director-General that employment should, in future, be included as a permanent theme on the agenda of the International Labour Conference deserves all support.

Original Spanish: Mrs. GONZALEZ MARTINEZ (Government delegate, Mexico) – Allow me, first of all, to congratulate Mr. Gray on his election as President of this historic session of the Conference. We are sure that under his leadership we will be able to make a sound analysis of tasks carried out and examine the future of the International Labour Organization, as it celebrates its 75th anniversary and the 50th Anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

It is an honour for me to head the Mexican delegation to this Conference, in which I am participating for the first time for almost 20 years. As a close friend of this establishment, I have followed its work with unvarying interest.

As the Director-General points out in his Report, the two anniversaries are being celebrated in the midst of a social crisis characterized by increasing poverty in many countries of the world, the spread of unemployment and the aggravation of social tensions. Therefore, the promotion of social justice postulated in our constitutional documents remains valid and is an essential objective of the ILO.

My Government thanks the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the broad review of the objectives and means available to our Organization which he has presented in his Report. As policy-making bodies, in this tripartite ILO, this Conference and later the Governing Body, will have to define the policies and lines of actions to guide future work.

In making a number of comments on the Director-General's Report, my delegation hopes to help towards defining a profile of the international organization that all its constituents wish to see.

First of all, my delegation agrees with the Report that the world is experiencing a process of dizzying change. However, the Report infers that ideological conflicts are disappearing and that social problems should be viewed only from the perspective of the consolidation of the world market economy and the promotion of formal democracy; but conflicts continue and have different causes and dynamics. In the economic field, people are still struggling to apply economic models which, under the same denominator, conceal different forms of production and marketing, as is shown by the divergencies arising between the industrialized countries in their attempts to open up trading space.

As to democracy, we always understand this from the standpoint of its basis of social justice. In other words, unless we pay attention to the demands of the majorities, unless we respect the forms of organization that people decide on, we will only be creating a fiction which can endanger peace and social stability.

Secondly, the Organization has two fundamental instruments to attain its objectives: international labour standards and technical cooperation. The Director-General emphasizes to this in his Report.

Twenty-five years ago at the same forum, Mr. Fernando Yllanes Ramos, a distinguished Mexican from whose experience we have all so benefited, drew attention to the principles which should guide the standard-setting work of the ILO. These principles remain valid.

It cannot be denied that the standard-setting function of the Organization should reflect the different economic, social and cultural realities of its constituents.

In Chapter 3 of his Report, the Director-General comments on various important aspects of international labour standards. He expresses the concern of the ILO constituents and of the Office itself that a number of Conventions are "outdated" and calls for a revision of them. However, his proposal to reorient the general surveys of the Committee of Experts or to elaborate different kinds of standards gives rise to several questions which should be given further thought and a broader debate.

We share the Director-General's idea that new and more flexible methods should be established for the follow-up and monitoring of the application of standards, which would alleviate the work burden of the Office – as well as that of the member States which have ratified the Conventions.

Given the importance of these proposals, they must be discussed in depth by the Governing Body, with the opinions of the Committee of Experts taken into account.

Another subject raised in Chapter 3 of the Report to which we feel bound to refer is the so-called "social clause", an idea which has arisen as a result of the globalization of the economy and the increase in international competition.

As the Director-General recognizes, some countries may see this clause as a new form of protectionism; and others may view it as a kind of extreme penalty which industrialized countries could use against the developing countries. We agree with the Report that the role of the ILO is not to advocate restrictions on trade or a compulsory equalization of social costs. We are very worried by the adoption of measures in some industrialized nations which restrict trade, although they are backed up by arguments of environmental protection or labour rights. The implications of this important topic require a thorough examination, which cannot be carried out at a single session of this Conference. This examination will have to take into account in particular the fundamental rights of trade unions and of collective bargaining, the right to strike and so on; and it should analyse the way in which not only States but also transnational enterprises monitor standards – as the latter are then guilty of exploiting labour and violating workers' rights.

As to technical cooperation, we noted with particular interest the concept of "active partnership" outlined in Chapter 4 which is intended to bring the Organization closer to its constituents. We would like to have more information about when this work is due to start and on the formation of the multidisciplinary teams.

In this matter, my Government believes it is essential to reiterate the need to give priority to activities which will create jobs, to training and the search for solutions to the problem of poverty. We have maintained that technical cooperation cannot be made subject to conditions – not even to compliance with ILO standards – because it is precisely where problems of application of Conventions exist that the cooperation and the support of the Organization is needed. The cooperation resources should be distributed fairly, without favouring particular regions or groups of countries.

The role of the ILO at the international stage is taken up in Chapter 5 of the Report. The action began in 1987, when it was underlined that structural adjustment policies, which should have a greater social component, should be continued. We agree with the Director-General when he says that the Organization must participate in any preparatory activity for the World Summit for Social Development and also its follow-up – as mentioned by the Secretary-General of the United Nations a few minutes ago.

In 1969, the initiative of a World Employment Programme was launched. Twenty-five years later the problem of unemployment remains one of the most worrying ones. In our view, solutions should be sought in each of the countries, in accordance with their prevailing conditions and by means of tripartite consultation, and the achievements should be circulated. The ILO should be a permanent forum of exchange of experience which would help to resolve this scourge.

Mexico – with the United States and Canada – has contributed to establishing a precedent at the world level in negotiating the North American Agreement on Labour Cooperation – under the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) – with the broad support of the International Standards Department of the ILO for which we are very grateful. This agreement is the first international instrument in the economic or trade field which states clearly the role of the ILO in its application. It provides a formula for social protection of citizens of the three States, as it grants the right which requires that the national authority must comply with their national labour laws including, of course, the Conventions they have ratified.

The ILO must retain its values, consolidate its objectives and establish the means for attaining them. We urge this Assembly to define the lines of action based on the principles and objectives set in our Constitution which should guide the future work of the ILO.

Finally, last April, in the Office of the President of the Republic, there was a ceremony to acknowledge the work of the ILO over the past 75 years. On this occasion, President Carlos Salinas de Gortari said on that occasion that: "In Mexico you can be sure – and you may give this message to the rest of the Members of the ILO – that we will continue to support with determination the ILO's work because this means more welfare for our workers and better prospects for the workers of the whole world."

Mr. REICH (Secretary of Labor, United States) – It is a privilege to be with you today at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. My personal congratulations to Mr. Charles Gray on his election as President of the Conference. Mr. Gray is Director of International Affairs of the AFL-CIO and we are very proud of him.

To Mr. Michel Hansenne, the ILO Director-General, I offer my congratulations on his thought-provoking Report to this Conference. It is a forward-looking document which provides a valuable framework for the debate on integration of labour standards and trade agendas.

I would like to begin by reaffirming the United States long-standing commitment to the ILO's cause and by applauding this Organization's pragmatic efforts to improve working conditions around the world.

I am proud to report that the Clinton Administration is firmly pledged to pursuing the ratification of major ILO Conventions. Before I came to Geneva, for example, I recommended to the President that he seek Senate ratification of Convention No. 150, and we are engaged in tripartite discussions on Convention No. 111 at this moment.

We stand at an especially appropriate point in history for celebrating the work of the ILO. This year marks not just the ILO's 75th year of service, but also the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, perhaps the most ambitious attempt so far to articulate an international position on labour standards. But today the issue of international labour standards has gained an extra degree of salience, symbolized by the recognition at Marrakesh that labour standards must be taken into account in formulating the work for the new World Trade Organization.

We have advanced beyond the conceptual gridlock that plagued the international community for so long. Few are willing to argue openly that labour standards, however egregious, are strictly internal affairs. Nor today are there many advocates, candid advocates, for the opposite extreme that argues that standards must be identical in every nation to those attained in the most advanced economies. We have achieved that essential prerequisite for consensus – a consensus to look to the middle ground.

Now, as we map the middle ground, let me begin by asserting the legitimacy of defining some absolute standards to which every country is expected to conform. Some labour practices simply place countries outside the community of civilized nations. How can these core labour standards be defined? Here, we must begin by looking to the International Labour Organization, whose work provides a solid foundation for any efforts to develop lists of proscribed practices. Any such list will certainly include goods produced by prison or slave labour. Some forms of child labour – such as work by very young children – will also be found to violate universal norms, even in the poorest countries. Nor is poverty a valid pretext for restricting freedom of association and organization or the rights of employers and workers to bargain collectively.

Beyond a short list of core labour standards, judgements must become more conditional. The international community clearly cannot attempt to dictate levels of working hours, minimum wages, benefits or health and safety standards uniformly matching those of the United States and other industrialized nations. The belief that developing countries must grow richer in order to improve living and working conditions, and that they must trade if they are to grow richer, has merits. Yet this observation contains within it an implicit acknowledgement that standards should not be and are not static, that a country's ability to offer it citizens better working lives rises with development, and that international expectations may properly rise as well.

So while it is neither fair nor realistic to insist that labour standards in this middle ground within developing countries must be identical to those in richer countries, it is appropriate to expect labour standards to improve as economies develop. This expectation reflects both moral and material interests. Countries with rising mass living standards offer growing markets for other countries' exports and thus all countries have an economic stake in broadly shared prosperity abroad. Free trade is a means, not an end. The end is rising living standards worldwide, more jobs and better jobs. But if a country pursues policies that hold down living standards and limit to a narrow elite the benefits of trade and development, the promise of open commerce is perverted and drained of its rationale.

If the world can legitimately expect rising labour standards and rising labour conditions to accompany third-world growth, then what criteria beyond the violation of those core absolute norms concerning prison labour, slavery, child labour and blatant restrictions on freedom of association and organization might provide guidance for where the international community should focus its attention?

Let me suggest to you a two-part test. The first concerns democratic institutions. The second concerns trends.

Labour conditions are determined by both economic and political factors, and it is, of course, difficult to disentangle the effects of each. But the existence of democratic institutions – that is, multiple parties, freedom of speech and the press, clean elections – does give cause for confidence that low wages and poor working conditions are related to economic constraints. The less democratic the country, the greater the grounds for suspicion or concern that labour standards are being suppressed in order to serve narrow commercial interests or a misguided mercantilist impulse on the part of elites.

Where there are reasonably robust democratic institutions, we can presume that labour conditions reflect what the country can afford, given its level of development. Again we refer to areas beyond and above the core area of basic human rights and labour standards. But what of countries where democratic institutions are weak or absent? For these countries, trends in labour standards and economic inequality offer a second sort of yardstick. Low-wage workers should become better off, not worse off, as trade and investment boost national income. The gap between rich and poor within a nation should tend to narrow with development, not widen. If a country lacks democratic institutions and fails to disseminate the benefits of growth, other countries might justifiably conclude that low labour standards are due not so much to poverty itself but to political choices that distort developments and warp the economy's structure.

The tentative framework I have laid out so far deals only with diagnosis, not with prescription. It deals only with goals, not with the means of encouraging their attainment. So the next question is: What response should the international community make to policies that affront the set of standards it comes to articulate? And here, let me limit myself to three general principles with regard to means.

First, it is clearly preferable for any intervention to be authorized and implemented multilaterally, in order to increase the odds that intervention will be effective.

Second, there should be a menu of potential responses to labour-standard abuses, varying in both the nature and the severity of their effects. This range could include technical assistance to clear the path to improvement, so-called "sunshine" provisions in order to highlight abuses, perhaps ineligibility for international grant and loan programmes, and targeted trade measures.

The third principle, which gives force to the other two, is pragmatism. The purpose of any intervention must be to bring about change in the offending nations. Scrupulous assessment and analysis, at each stage, must inform the international community's efforts to improve labour standards. And we must not lose sight of the fact that trade itself – by opening an economy to external influences and empowering a wider range of internal interests – can, on occasion, be a catalyst for progressive change.

Developing a detailed programme for advancing international labour conditions will occupy us until the century's end and probably beyond. Let us waste no time in continuing, and extending and giving practical force to the core mission of the International Labour Organization. We hope and expect that the ILO's formidable knowledge and expertise will be fully utilized by the World Trade Organization as it considers the role of appropriate labour standards in an increasingly integrated world economy.

Original French: Mr. GIRAUD (Minister of Labour, Employment and Vocational Training, France) To represent France at this 75th anniversary Session is for me both an honour and a great responsibility. At this moment, speaking from this rostrum, I feel I am modestly but faithfully continuing the work of many of my compatriots who in one capacity or another have played a role in the establishment or the work of the International Labour Organization.

I should like to reiterate today on behalf of my Government its confidence in the ILO and the respect it has for the Organization.

To attend this year's session of the Conference is not just to participate in an anniversary. For each of us, it is also an opportunity to express our views about the future of the ILO.

The Report of the Director-General, which is typical of the excellent work done by Mr. Michel Hansenne and his team in the Office, contains a wealth of material. It is brimming with ideas and roads to be explored. It gives us food for thought and it will continue to do so.

For a long time, the essential role of the ILO was to defend democratic values every inch of the way in the face of totalitarian regimes.

The collapse of those regimes, instead of making things easier for the Organization whose principles have been largely recognized, has paradoxically left it confused and disoriented, without clear points of reference. It is now for us, its constituents, to demonstrate during these few days here in Geneva our determination to strengthen its authority, its influence and its confidence in the future.

I will limit myself to three brief sets of comments.

First of all, in general terms, I endorse the choice of the Director-General for the title of his Report. It is true that there are both values to be defended and changes to be promoted.

The values to be defended have represented for 75 years the originality, and more than that, the very reason for this Organization's existence. They are tripartism and the system of standards which distinguish it from all other international agencies.

I am convinced that neither is being called into question. This does not mean, however, that there is nothing to change in these values.

It would seem to be quite understandable that, in the absence of a common struggle against totalitarianism, the two non-governmental groups in this Organization should once again express their differences and points of disagreement in their respective fields. It is a difficult debate perhaps, but a salutary one.

I am not challenging the fact that the ILO involves other social participants in its work, listens to them and benefits from what they have to say. On the other hand, negotiating and decision-making mechanisms must remain what they already are: fully tripartite.

As for the so-called "crisis of the standards system", I do not believe in it. Why have the most recent Conventions not been ratified? Simply because they are hardly ratifiable. The combined perfectionism of each of the three groups has produced texts which are far too detailed. Although this is a relatively recent phenomenon, it is nonetheless regrettable. For example, after examination by my country's authorities of the last eight Conventions adopted by the Conference, we found that only one could be approved as it stands.

I would like to appeal for simplicity and clarity of text to be the objectives in all stages of production of standards. We should not neglect any formulas for gradual application, including, for example, Conventions ratified in parts. This does not mean, of course, that we should be satisfied with vague or ambiguous texts.

It is commonly said that the ILO has a wealth of 174 Conventions. That is both true and false. In concrete terms, many of these are obsolete or closed to ratification. Why not slow down the production rate, concentrate on current, valid Convention, and give priority to revising the outdated ones?

As for the idea of complementing the standard-setting work with tripartite texts prepared more quickly so they are better adapted to current situations, I agree with this proposal, provided that the Conventions remain the legal reference point for us all.

I believe the search for clarity and effectiveness in the ILO's work is a priority.

This leads me to a second comment. The Organization's image in the world is a good one. It is good, but too obscure. We must think not only about the place that the ILO should occupy but also of its capacity to project itself on the international scene.

Though the ILO is perceived as a respectable institution, it is nevertheless viewed as out of touch with the world and confined to little-known and complicated work. More dynamism and presence in the daily life of people would give the Organization a more modern and more attractive image, enabling it to accept the challenge of history, as it has been requested to do by the Secretary-General of the United Nations. I believe the establishment of multidisciplinary teams in some parts of the world is a good initiative in this sense, and one which should be followed up.

I also encourage the Director-General to act on what he says in his Report, by envisaging the possibility for the Office to offer a voluntary mediation and arbitration procedure on a permanent basis. This is an interesting idea and one which should be developed.

There can be no doubt that the ILO's dynamism should be felt in the other international organizations. First of all, we must affirm the place of social questions in the United Nations system. The role that the ILO is playing in preparing for the World Summit for Social Development is a particularly valuable one and one which should continue after the Summit. It is also necessary to continue the close cooperation with the Bretton Woods institutions, in particular with regard to the essential social dimension in the structural adjustment process.

My third and last comment is a kind of synthesis of the two earlier ones. We are now living in an open world, and fortunately in one which has rid itself of ideological conflicts, in a world of trade. This new world, however, must not be governed by economic power struggles alone. There can be no goal of profit without an assertion of responsibility, and specifically of social and human responsibility. No group, no country can benefit from a lack of rules concerning people at work.

Nations cannot liberalize world trade on the one hand while separately and unrelatedly agreeing on social precepts on the other. The two approaches must be coordinated, and for certain questions they must go hand in hand.

The ILO has become a truly universal institution. The great majority of its member States are free and responsible States. Is this not the right time to agree on a number of simple rules to serve as universal reference points? Do we not need a few rules to act as a common thread, a common belief binding together all States belonging to the ILO in a common commitment?

Is the term "social clause" the best one? It is sometimes perceived as a vague threat of protectionism. Perhaps we should speak at the very least of minimum regulations preserving the dignity of working people.

Permit me to recall what I said last year from this rostrum. Four themes, each dealt with in one or more Conventions, could represent a "basic core", the heart of the common commitment: the abolition of forced labour, non-discrimination in employment, minimum age for employment and freedom of association.

The standards which give effect to these four absolute imperatives must be given priority in their application and serve as a reference point in the future work of the World Trade Organization. They are certainly not ad hoc provisions. These texts are public and are well-known. They have already been ratified by many States in all regions of the world. These standards have been prepared with care after painstaking work. Above all, they have an indisputable tripartite legitimacy.

Need I add that the approach must provide social, human and even moral incentives. This is contrary to a protectionist approach, which has been evoked in certain texts that I have recently seen and which I believe is inappropriate. Matching its actions to its convictions, and specifically to what I am now saying on its behalf, France will join the group of countries contributing to the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour. Is this Programme not a good example of what the ILO can do to support its standard-setting action?

In his Report, the Director-General describes several complex ways to link the liberalization of trade and respect for certain labour standards. I will not give an opinion on these proposals today. For me and for France, the main thing is that there should be permanent, firm and unswerving pressure brought to bear, as the ILO is capable of doing, for example in the form of an annual report passed on by the Governing Body to the Conference.

In short, it is my sincere wish that the Organization should promote its own renewal and become what it was 75 years ago – young, tough, enterprising and creative – and that it should once again find the dynamism of its founding fathers. Today, as in 1919, it can count on France's strong support.

Mr. BLUM (Federal Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Germany) – Just like 25 years ago, it is not a Government delegate but a Workers' delegate who is presiding over this Conference on the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization. The equal rights and responsibilities of the social partners in the decision-making process of this Organization are thus impressively reaffirmed. I am pleased to join the previous speakers in wishing the President, and his deputies every success in the discharge of their tasks.

Freedom, justice and peace – these are the aspirations of the entire human race, irrespective of geographical location, sex, religion or political conviction. There can be no peace without freedom. Where freedom is lacking, there is always a danger of war or unstable peace. And there can be no peace without justice. When the bombs of hunger explode throughout the world, the impact will be just as damaging as that of an atomic bomb. For as long as decent people live in hunger throughout the world, freedom will continue to be in danger. The ILO is an Organization that works on behalf of peace.

There are major conflicts in this world: people are being tortured and killed – no one can remain ignorant of this fact. But there are also areas of progress. One such area is evidenced by the fact that, after I speak, South Africa will be taking the floor. This shows that peace, human rights and democracy can be made to prevail. The existence of progress and not just setbacks is a source of hope for this Organization.

We have come together to work for the social future and the future of labour in the world. It is a task that no country can address alone and that is why the work of this Organization is an important form of cooperation – of peoples, nations and States.

Standard-setting is an important instrument to that end. But neither standard-setting nor opposition to new standards is an end in itself. That is why I have always asked which standards serve the purpose of freedom, justice and peace, and which standards are an obstacle to those aims. Obsolete standards and standards for which there is no strict need damage the reputation of the ILO. It is therefore important to give some thought to the updating of standards and the selection of themes for the setting of new standards. Freedom of assembly and collective bargaining must also be guaranteed in member States that have not ratified the relevant ILO Conventions. There can be no freedom without those rights. The States concerned must allow their observance to be monitored. This does not, however, apply to other Conventions.

The subject of social clauses is a controversial one. Opponents of such clauses fear that they will be misused for protectionist purposes. But this concern cannot be invoked as a reason for the ILO to ignore the subject. The ILO cannot be indifferent to the fact that certain goods are sold cheaply on world markets solely because they are produced, for example, through the exploitation of children who are forced to work under unhealthy conditions. World trade cannot be based on exploitation. The benefits and profits of world trade should not be the result of the exploitation of child labour. It is not sufficient for the World Trade Organization to place this item on its agenda. Are trade experts supposed to decide whether and how seriously workers' rights have been violated? There is a question that I would like to ask employers in particular: do you really believe that your interests are better served by the government-run World Trade Organization than by the tripartite ILO?

Perhaps there should be less talk about "sanctions" in connection with the social clauses. I find the words "persuasion" and "assistance" more appropriate – the idea of helping countries to find a way out of impossible situations and to overcome problems in implementing basic standards. I think this is very important for the elimination of child labour, an ILO programme that is financed largely by Germany. I should like to take this opportunity to call on all countries to participate in this programme.

Mr. Director-General, on Tuesday you came up with some very interesting ideas on how to solve the problems of employment. I am convinced that the victims of unemployment cannot be helped by adopting a strictly national approach. There are no longer any national economies: there is only a world economy. That is why we need a coordinated programme to fight against unemployment. A basic prerequisite for success in this struggle, and here I refer to your interesting and important proposals, is to diagnose the causes of the epidemic of worldwide unemployment so that we can devise an appropriate treatment for the disease.

Of course, there is no panacea and circumstances vary widely but we need to agree on the goals: employment for all, both young and old, women and men, the disabled and the fit. I think that the right to work is a human right – to each according to his or her ability – also for the disabled. I do not think that this right is enjoyed automatically. It is an area in which political support is necessary for the integration into the world of work of those with special difficulties in finding employment: young people, unskilled, older workers, women and the disabled.

In this context, I would like to say that, from the experience in my own country, vocational training is of prime importance. We must provide those who are unemployed – or threatened with unemployment – with the opportunity of being trained or re-trained in occupational skills. And I am not just referring to high-level skills but also broad-based skills.

Furthermore, we should also base our concept of working time on the needs of individuals rather than on purely economic needs. There should be no contradiction between these requirements. We must also take into account the needs of the disabled and other categories of workers when considering the issue of working time.

As concerns wage policy, collective bargaining is better able to solve problems in this area because it is more flexible than statutory provisions – and because it is the fruit of dialogue.

We need also new areas of employment; for instance in the personal services sector, there are areas in which workers cannot, in spite of technical progress, be replaced by machines.

We need to work together and raise awareness: after all, we are living in the same world.

The hole in the ozone layer is not just a national phenomenon. It affects all of us and we are all responsible. We must therefore take joint decisions. This is also true in the social area: there is no satisfactory solution that can be beneficial to one part of the world while being detrimental to another. And this is why, when we join together in a combined front to combat unemployment, we are also striving to uphold solidarity amongst all human beings – irrespective of their origins, faith or race.

Solidarity is the rallying cry of our age.

Mr. MBOWENI (Minister of Labour, South Africa) – May I on behalf of my delegation congratulate Mr. Gray on his election as President of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

On behalf of our President, Nelson Mandela, and the Government of national unity and the people of South Africa, I express our collective gratitude to the ILO for the selfless commitment which has been shown over the years by the focusing of the energies and resources of this Organization on overcoming the evil system of apartheid.

We stand here before you to proclaim loudly and clearly, as did Martin Luther King: Free at last! Free at last! Thank God Almighty, we are free at last!

We are proud, indeed elated, to join the international community of nations as a sovereign, democratic and universally recognized State. There could be no more fitting an occasion for our accession to the Constitution of the ILO than on its 75th anniversary, an anniversary that represents 75 years of pursuit of social justice. The Director-General's Report Defending values, promoting change is therefore an appropriate theme for this anniversary Conference. As this Conference charts its course, we in South Africa are mapping our own. The ILO principles of tripartism, social partnership and social justice are our compass.

Our reconstruction and development programme is premised on respect for human and worker rights. We are committed to growth, but not at the expense of the rights of our people. We, the victims of apartheid, should know that the human costs of our societies should not lead us to disregard fundamental human rights.

Moreover, our reconstruction and development programme derives its legitimacy from the support it commands amongst the major stakeholders of our society. Amidst all the violence which has racked our country, and during the protracted constitutional negotiations, our trade unions and employers have established tripartite institutions to jointly formulate macroeconomic and labour market policies.

As we stand here today, proud and excited as a new Member of the ILO, we do so fully aware of the overall context of global economic change and its implications for our own economy and those of southern Africa. We are nonetheless fully cognisant of our responsibilities as a citizen of the world and a Member of this Organization. Our President, Nelson Mandela, has expressed our standpoint in the 75th anniversary volume of essays, Visions of the future of social justice. "We cannot rebuild our society", he says, "at the expense of the standard of living of ordinary men and women. We cannot develop at the expense of social justice. We cannot compete without a floor of basic human standards. If this is true inside our own society, it is true for the world as a whole."

Our stated commitment, and that of the ILO, to uphold and promote basic standards is all the more relevant within the context of a rapidly changing global economy. As the Secretary of Labor of the United States has pointed out in one of his writings, in terms of global restructuring, he says, "There will no longer be national products or technologies, no national corporations, no national industries". In a real sense, the control by the nation State over its national economic policy is increasingly disappearing and regional and international organizations are assuming an ever greater role in domestic economic policy.

The challenge facing the ILO in this context is to continue with the setting of standards and the upholding of social justice. More importantly, it must seek more effective ways of setting and securing compliance with these standards. The present process of individual States ratifying standards may prove ineffective in the context of a new global economic order which transcends national economic boundaries. What increasingly needs to be addressed is the elaboration of a core of standards, like those embodied in Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, which are so fundamental and universal that they should apply to all States regardless of their levels of development. To prevent this requirement from degenerating into a new form of protectionism the responsibility for supervising these core standards must rest with an independent expert body of the ILO.

The pressures individual nations are facing in this new world order are profound and their impact on working people may result in the whittling away of international standards. Undermining universally accepted standards should never provide the competitive edge. Who then, amongst the existing international organizations, can play the role of guardian of social justice? There is only one answer to give to this question. The ILO is best placed to defend and promote social and economic justice in a global context. The poor and vulnerable must not be sacrificed at the altar of globalization. The defence of social justice within this changing global economy is therefore as relevant, or perhaps more so, today than it was in 1919, or when the Declaration of Philadelphia was formulated.

The need to devise new forms of standard-setting appropriate to the rapidly changing global economy presents an opportunity to review the relevance of our normative system. Our commitment to upholding standards must never lead us into the trap of inflexibility and rigidity. The world is ever changing and we must always adapt to the changing world. However, that adaptation must never result in the gutting of international standards.

As a newly emerging nation in the global milieu, we appeal to the tripartite institutions of the ILO to take as solid and pivotal a stand as they took in promoting the elimination of apartheid, to ensure that the ILO's fundamental principles constitute the floor upon which the nations of the world engage in international trade and investment.

Turning to our own situation in South Africa and southern Africa, we are painfully aware of the devastating consequences of the apartheid system. Our aim is to overcome these consequences through the implementation of our reconstruction and development programme.

In 1988 our trade union movement lodged a complaint against the previous Government for violations of freedom of association. The Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission of the ILO came to South Africa to investigate the complaint. It found our law wanting in crucial aspects in this respect. The previous Government was reluctant to give full effect to its recommendations. We are, however, prepared to say here now that we will comply with the recommendations. Furthermore, I undertake to put before our Government of national unity and our social partners the recommendation that we ratify immediately the Conventions on freedom of association, collective bargaining, discrimination and forced labour.

Our tripartite institutions have already embarked on a major programme of labour law reform encompassing the harmonization, modernization and rationalization of the fragmented labour laws of the various homelands in South Africa.

Once again we salute all the Members of the ILO for your efforts in supporting the transition to democracy in South Africa, and we congratulate you on the 75th anniversary of the ILO and we wish to say once again that without you our struggle may have been a lot longer.

Original French: (Mgr. TAURAN Secretary for Relations with States, The Holy See) – I would like to join the speakers who preceded me and address to the President my very warm congratulations on his election to the presidency of this Conference and offer him my best wishes for the successful completion of his task. It is a particularly pleasant duty for me to convey to you the wishes of His Holiness Pope John Paul II as you celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The Holy Father calls down divine blessing upon you all and on your labours.

Since 1919, the collaboration between your Organization and the Holy See has been constant: the numerous messages from the Holy Father, as well as the visits made by Pope Paul VI and John Paul II to the Organization's Geneva headquarters show the high esteem in which the Catholic Church holds the fundamental inspiration that lies behind the work done by the ILO: improving workers' conditions of life through genuine social dialogue, freedom of association, abolition of child labour and reconciling work with family life.

With the severe social problems facing men and women today, sight should not be lost of the mission this Organization has set itself. The title of the Director-General's Report, which will guide our debates, Defending values, promoting change, is an apt reminder of this. Now, as ever before, the world of work, as we all know, needs men and women with deep political, humanistic and religious convictions if we are to create societies with more brotherly love, where all have a chance to develop their talents in doing a job and where no-one suffers from want and poverty. To achieve this is truly to render one's brethren the greatest of services.

For the past 75 years, the ILO's endeavour has been just that: being of service to mankind and, through the international standards it draws up and its many technical cooperation activities, helping each nation formulate its social policies. It may be, perhaps, that the public at large is sufficiently aware of this vast wealth of texts and initiatives. Wider dissemination of this wealth might help those who throughout the world – and there are more of them than one might think – who are anxious to place the good of mankind before their own immediate interests and to promote real and equitable solidarity. We must avoid ready-made, over-simplistic solutions which will never solve any fundamental problems. In short, work too needs a "moral" dimension. Religion can, here, offer great support for both the workers and for those responsible for society. The Catholic Church, in particular, has ever endeavoured through its social doctrine to emphasize to all that "capital is for work and not work for capital", in the same way that "work is for £man', and not £man' for work". These were the words of Pope John Paul II in his first social encyclical Laborem exercens.

On the eve of the twenty-first century, the International Labour Organization must more than ever act as the world's social conscience. The Holy See would submit for your consideration three priorities to make your praiseworthy efforts even more fruitful.

First, the government representatives must maintain and strengthen the so strenuously devised principles of social protection of the workers for whom they are responsible.

Second, the heads of undertakings have great responsibility for creating employment without making concessions to pitiless competition. The main objective for undertakings is not just to multiply the goods they produce, but also to produce wealth for all.

"Social" movements themselves have an essential role to play in promoting workers' and employers' rights and duties. It must constantly be borne in mind that, as once again stated in Laborem exercens, "It is characteristic of work that it first and foremost unites people. In this consists its social power".

It is satisfying to note that the continuity of the activities undertaken over the past 75 years has made it possible for the Organization to promote real social dialogue among member States on the issues which affect people's daily lives. The globalization of the world economy, as fittingly analysed in the Report of the Director-General is fraught with the grave risk of deteriorating working conditions. This is why is seems important to draw your attention to the universal dimension of social justice. Standards common to all countries and regulatory measures having the consensus of all partners should contribute to man, and man alone, being the criterion for any social activity anywhere. It will then be easier to remedy situations of injustice without destroying what we are trying to protect. This presupposes mutual recognition and an ongoing dialogue between responsible officials, employers and workers' movement.

On this point, the International Labour Organization is fortunate, within the multilateral framework, to be in direct contact with the principal social partners and to benefit through tripartism from an incomparable wealth of knowledge. Thus it is for you, as privileged representatives of the world of work and through your regulatory activities, to participate in this new stage in close collaboration with all the other international institutions.

It is not for the Catholic Church to offer technical solutions to these serious problems, but all the children of the Church, and I think I may say this of many other believers, are very much aware now more than ever before that God expects each one of them to show a spirit of solidarity to his brothers and sisters in humanity to ensure that selfishness, indifference and sometimes even hate, never have the final say. It depends on each of you, on each of us, to keep the door of hope always open.

Original Japanese: Mr. KAWAKAMI (Parliamentary Vice-Minister, Japan) – First of all, on behalf of the Government of Japan I would like to offer the President my most sincere congratulations on his election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. Allow me also to welcome the representative of the Republic of South Africa which rejoined the ILO, and the representatives of States attending this Conference for the first time.

I would like to congratulate the International Labour Organization on its 75th anniversary and on the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. I would also like to express my sincerest gratitude to the ILO for its great contribution to the betterment of the world, especially in the areas of human rights and working conditions. I am, indeed, honoured to be able to participate in this memorable session.

The international society is faced with dramatic changes that it has never experienced before, and it is certain that new international relationships will replace the international order of the past. At the same time, economic globalization through expanded international trade has made the domestic policies of our nations more susceptible to the influence of the international community. In such circumstances, the world community is faced with regional instabilities as a result of tribal, ethnic and religious issues, and with problems of poverty and structural adjustment in a number of developing countries.

The future objectives of the ILO should therefore be to thoroughly analyse the new developments and to consider how to adapt the ILO's role to the rapidly changing international situation.

In this regard it is important to have a policy of establishing priorities and to play an effective role in the solution of various problems in the labour field that are currently facing the world, such as employment problems, while recognizing the scope of the ILO's mandate, and the usefulness of the principle of tripartism.

I would like to comment on the major points in the Report of the Director-General. First, regarding international standard-setting activities, I wish to highly commend the ILO's great contribution towards the protection of human rights and the improvement of working conditions through standard-setting activities. However, as the Director-General reported, the rate of ratification of these standards has been on the decline recently and drawing up common standards is becoming more difficult because of the varied needs and environments of each member State. Therefore I think that we must reconsider whether we should maintain the present pace of standard-setting and what the content of the standards should be. I think that it is important to adopt universal and truly necessary treaties that cover a wide variety of industries and workers, and to draw up standards of a flexible nature that take the diverse circumstances of the various member States into consideration rather than putting importance on the pace of standard-setting.

I would now like to comment on the issue of international labour standards and international trade. I consider it a basic principle for the ILO to be involved in these matters within its scope of power, as stated in the Director-General's Report. Based on the recognition that the ILO's efforts to expedite social progress should be made not by force but through cooperation, the ILO should avoid restricting international trade and equalizing social costs by force. I also consider it important that member States take the attitude of evaluating themselves voluntarily regarding the application of labour standards in order to maintain the effectiveness of these standards. These are very sensitive matters considering that internationally recognized concepts of labour standards are still not necessarily clear and that such a situation may lead to talk about trade protectionism depending on the outcome of the discussions. In consideration of this point, I think it desirable to take careful note of these issues in order to maintain the free trade system and to discuss matters from an objective point of view.

I would further like to say something about what kind of activities the ILO should perform in order to respond to the needs of its member States in the future. I think that it is important for the ILO aggressively to promote technical cooperation which is one of the ILO's pillars, in addition to its standard-setting activities, as well as to provide information on employment and labour issues and to provide room for tripartite dialogue. As is stated in the Director-General's Report, we expect that the ILO will reinforce the effective activities of technical cooperation while taking into account the deepening significance of international labour standards and without using this as a means of reward or punishment for member States. As far as Japan is concerned, we are prepared to contribute more forcefully to the various activities performed by the ILO in order to solve various problems in developing and other countries on the basis of the ILO's role in the world becoming more and more important. Before closing my remarks, I would like to commend the very important suggestions given by the Director-General in his Report concerning the future direction of the ILO, and to reiterate his hope that this session will see fruitful discussions based on his Report. I also wish to reaffirm very clearly my country's commitment to making renewed efforts to contribute to the ILO's fulfilment of its important tasks and its future sound development.

Mr. LATIEF (Minister of Manpower, Indonesia) – I should like to begin by congratulating the President, on his unanimous election at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I believe that under his able and wise guidance this particular session of the Conference will produce fruitful results. My congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents and all the other Officers of the Conference. May I join with the previous speakers in welcoming the new Members of the ILO. My delegation is particularly gratified to see the united, democratic and non-racial Republic of South Africa rejoining our Organization.

This year's session of the Conference is indeed a particular as well as an important one, not only because it coincides with the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, but also because it is held against the backdrop of continuing significant changes in the world order. It could not be a better choice, therefore, for the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, to pick Defending values, promoting change as the title of his Report to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. At this juncture, I would like to extend our thanks and gratitude to Mr. Hansenne and his staff for providing us with such a through-provoking and comprehensive Report.

Indonesia is also heartened by the fact that this year's session of the Conference has chosen one of the ILO principles, namely social justice, as its main theme. The same theme has indeed become the burning motivation of our founding fathers in their struggle for national independence. When the Indonesian people proclaimed independence in 1945, the principle of social justice was constitutionally enshrined in our basic state philosophy and the 1945 Constitution.

The era of economic globalization marks certain trends, among others, the expansion of international trade, the rapid movement of international capital and foreign investments, and the gradual liberalization of the national economies. In particular, the agreement reached with GATT in the framework of the Uruguay Round will no doubt have a tremendous impact on the world's economy. Amidst those positive developments, however, we are also witnessing continuing difficulties and new problems. Of more direct concern to the ILO, accelerated globalization has also had an impact on the world of work, giving rise to new social and labour problems and widening deep-seated inequalities both between States and peoples.

One social consequence of the economic globalization that has come into the open recently is the issue of a social clause which links labour standards and workers' rights with international trade. In this regard, while recognizing the importance of universal standards, it is our view that in the implementation, the different circumstances of each country must be taken into consideration, for we should bear in mind that the implementation of the same standard in two different situations will also produce different results. As far as this social clause issue is concerned, the position of Indonesia is clear. Along with other ASEAN member countries, we strongly believe that this linkage is inappropriate and would only result in undesirable trade distortions to the detriment of the general welfare. Therefore, my delegation fully agrees with the statement of the Minister of Labour of India on this controversial issue.

It is indeed disheartening for us to note the intransigence of some developed countries in terms of linking the protection and promotion of workers with market access and trade preferences, especially as they do so in total disregard of the problems faced by developing countries, in particular their employment standards. Even worse, they put pressure and impose conditionalities on developing countries to adopt their standards which are incompatible with the prevailing conditions, that is the level of development of developing countries.

It should be recalled that in the World Conference on Human Rights in Vienna in 1993, the right to development was recognized as a universal and inalienable right and an integral part of fundamental human rights. The full realization of the right to development would eventually lead developing countries to a higher level of development, which would also mean not only a higher level of workers' welfare, but also greater latitude to accept and implement more international labour standards. Therefore, it is only appropriate for us to expect that, instead of applying pressure and setting conditionalities, States can cooperate with each other in ensuring steady development and in eliminating obstacles to this development.

In the case of my country, in the past years Indonesia has implemented the principles of the market economy and, through participation in the international world markets, the appropriate use of modern technology and the mobilization of available domestic and foreign resources, the country's economy has developed considerably. In spite of its achievements, however, like any other developing country, Indonesia is certainly not free from problems, including social and labour problems. It is as a matter of policy, therefore, that Indonesia attaches great importance to cooperation with all countries, developed and developing alike.

In this spirit of cooperation, it is important that developing countries, in the process of attaining a higher degree of development and bringing about welfare and social justice, can benefit from assistance and advice through training, education and the transfer of technology. It is indeed a mutually beneficial cooperation of this kind that should be promoted and nurtured in order to eliminate distortions, strains and imbalances among countries.

With regard to the implementation of the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), I would like to say a few words. A low level of education and lack of adequate information can be the cause of ignorance of the implementation of such rights. Given these circumstances, it should be easy to understand why workers in Indonesia are still lagging behind in establishing their organizations for collective bargaining. In an effort to awaken the workers' consciousness of their rights, the Government of Indonesia has held education programmes for workers.

Within the framework of the implementation of Convention No. 98, the Government of Indonesia has requested the ILO to send a direct contacts mission in order to advise Indonesia on how best to implement it. The mission visited Indonesia in November 1993 and, in addition to the direct contacts mission, Indonesia has also benefited from ILO technical cooperation and its policy advice, through the visit of the ILO Deputy Director-General, Mr. Maier, and other ILO experts to Indonesia last month, in conjunction with seven national seminars on labour matters. Those seminars also mark the 75th anniversary of the ILO. It is hoped that through those visits, Indonesia can learn from ILO expertise to overcome the obstacles we encounter.

Finally, I am confident that under the President's wise guidance and able leadership we, who gather here on the 75th anniversary of the ILO, will find the best way to translate our commitment to the development and welfare of our workers into reality.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-KHALIFA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Bahrain) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, it gives me great pleasure to extend to the President my congratulations for the valuable confidence conferred on him by all the delegates at this session of the Conference. I wish him every success.

I am also pleased to extend my sincere appreciation to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for his efforts in preparing his Report and for his success in selecting the subject-matter. The Report is characterized by scientific methodology, an integrated viewpoint and thorough coverage. The Report makes it incumbent upon each and every one of us to initiate a critical and objective discussion to ensure that the situations, causes and conclusions contained in the Report benefit from fresh thinking and new approaches. By so doing, we shall come up with a clear vision of our Organization's course that is compatible with future needs.

The significance of this year's Report by the Director-General is that it coincides with the 75th anniversary of the ILO's establishment and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which has placed on the Organization the responsibility for viewing all economic, financial and international policies and measures and evaluating them in the light of the fundamental objective, namely social justice. This is in addition to the major and evolving political, economic and social changes which are witnessed by our world today and the impact of such changes on labour matters in general and functions of the ILO's tripartite pillars in particular.

Therefore, it was highly appropriate for the Director-General to select Defending values, promoting change as the title for his Report.

The rapid economic changes entailed in the transition to a market economy together with increasing world trade of commodities and services, the growing share of multinational companies in economic activities and integration of financial markets, are all obvious evidence that the economy is rapidly becoming more cosmopolitan and globally competitive.

All these changes will have a significant impact on the course of the Organization. Moreover, the technological development and change of management style in private establishments and organizations will inevitably create new social problems. It is therefore incumbent on the ILO to adopt new resolutions and make the necessary revisions to its standards which will reflect developments in the new world system and to be consistent with the ILO's efforts to maintain values and social justice.

We agree with the Director-General's Report with regard to looking for new and flexible standards which will enable the ILO to introduce improvements to its main functions. This is particularly true in relation to the cooperation process among member States, employers' associations and workers' organizations, as well as providing opportunities for adapting future functions in the light of increasing changes towards globalization of the economic system. We also support the Director-General in emphasizing the significance of tripartite cooperation at the international level and the contribution of the ILO in making world policies that would enable the partners to increase their role in today's economically unified world. Such a contribution may be in the form of assistance and providing and developing new solutions which would combine labour requirements and rights. Our contribution may be to emphasize that the most significant challenge before policy-makers in the world is the creation of new employment opportunities and the elimination of unemployment. We also agree with the Director-General that we need to review obsolete international Conventions and those that have proved to be incompatible with the changing world. On the other hand, the ILO must support and enhance those Conventions which have proved to be effective in addressing the economic and social problems of the world.

(The Conference adjourned at 1 p.m.)

Eighth sitting

Thursday, 9 June 1993, 3 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Matinchev, Mr. Gray

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. MATINCHEV) – We will now continue our discussion of the Report of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. CORE (Government delegate, Australia) – On behalf of the Australian Government, it gives me a lot of pleasure to join with other speakers in congratulating the President on his election to preside over this 75th anniversary session of the International Labour Conference. It is a fitting tribute to the ILO's unique tripartite structure that the Conference President has been drawn from the ranks of the workers on this historic occasion.

I am also pleased that the Report before the Conference is a forward-looking document that seeks to build on the ILO's widely acknowledged achievements since 1919 in promoting social justice and protecting the rights of working men and women. While there is much of which the ILO can be justifiably proud, this anniversary year provides the opportunity to evaluate the role of the Organization and to chart a future course. Setting that course will require the full participation of the ILO's tripartite constituents and the International Labour Office.

The Report of the Director-General provides an excellent platform for our discussions. The frank analysis of the ILO's strengths and weaknesses is welcome. We also welcome the wide range of proposed measures in the areas of standards, services and policy-making. These proposals should be examined in detail by the Governing Body over the next year.

Today, I would like to comment on the most critical issues that the ILO will need to address if it is to effectively meet the challenges of poverty, unemployment and the denial of basic rights.

There is no doubt that the ILO has been, and remains, an effective international organization.

Its relevance is demonstrated year after year by the adoption, ratification and application of international labour standards.

With more than 6,000 ratifications of ILO Conventions and more than 2,000 cases where governments have brought national legislation and policy into line with the requirements of ratified Conventions, ILO standards and supervisory mechanisms have demonstrated their worth.

Even unratified ILO Conventions can exert a definite influence, although this does not weaken the case for revision of outmoded and overly rigid Conventions which have not been widely ratified or implemented.

In his address to the Conference last year, the Australian Minister for Industrial Relations foreshadowed that the Government would be introducing legislation to give the Australian workers access to new national minimum standards based on ILO Conventions.

The enactment of these ILO Conventions has now been achieved and has been established in legislation which has been passed by the national Parliament. This legislation provides for a system of enterprise bargaining underpinned by a safety net of awards and minimum entitlements. It opens the way for Australian workplaces to meet the challenges of being more productive, more internationally competitive, but within a framework of safe minimum standards.

The minimum entitlements provisions, based on ILO Conventions, guarantee Australian workers a fair minimum wage, equal pay, 12 months' unpaid parental leave and protection against unfair dismissal in cases where adequate protection is not available through the awards of industrial tribunals or legislation. The impetus for the inclusion of unpaid parental leave as part of these industrial relations reforms was our commitment to the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156).

During this International Year of the Family, ILO Convention No. 156 and the issue of balancing work and family responsibilities have been identified as a real priority. In this regard, the recent legislation facilitated the establishment of an Australian Community Standard for family leave during 1994, through a special family leave case which is now being heard by the Australian Industrial Relations Commission. The test case aims to establish entitlements for employees to leave of absence to provide care and support for members of their immediate family.

In keeping with this emphasis on equity and fairness, the Government and the Australian Council of Trade Unions have recently agreed to support access to safety-net adjustments in 1994 and 1995 for workers unable to achieve increases through enterprise agreements. In addition, in the spirit of the Maternity Protection (Revised) Convention, 1952 (No. 103), the Australian Government has recently announced a commitment to give consideration in next year's budget process to introducing a maternity allowance through our social security system.

Today, I am pleased to announce Australia's ratification of the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employers' Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173). Australia can accept the obligations in Part II of the Convention relating to the protection of workers' claims following the passage of legislative changes which give workers' claims a higher priority than those made by the State.

Currently, Australia is evaluating several Conventions concerning basic human rights and will be pursuing their ratification during the ILO's 75th anniversary year. In addition, we are actively considering the ratification of a number of ILO occupational health and safety Conventions, and maritime Conventions. There is no doubt in our mind of the continuing importance and relevance of ILO standard-setting activities.

The ILO's relevance is not just a matter of history and tradition. As the report of the Committee of Experts points out, 398 ratifications by 38 member States were registered last year and eight new member States have joined the ILO.

Australia is particularly pleased to welcome the Republic of South Africa into the ILO. The struggle by the people of South Africa against apartheid was long and difficult, and the ILO has played a key role in this struggle, but there is still a long road ahead in overcoming the legacy of apartheid.

We welcome the ILO's plan of action to assist South Africa and endorse this as a high-priority activity. You can be assured that Australia will play its role in the economic and social development of South Africa, both as a friend of the ILO and as a friend of South Africa.

Recent reforms in the ILO's policy organs and field structures have done much, in our view, to increase the Organization's effectiveness and relevance. Action is under way to review the ILO's programme of sectoral activities. Close monitoring by the constituents will be needed to ensure the realization of the expected benefits of these reforms already in place, as well as the proposed sectoral measures. But further reforms are required in our view.

Budget processes should be reviewed to provide greater flexibility in managing scarce resources and focusing on desirable outcomes. Accountability to the constituents must be ensured through quality reporting, auditing and evaluation.

The general surveys by the Committee of Experts could be reoriented to provide an evaluation of unratified Conventions and Recommendations, thereby playing a major part in maintaining a modern and effective International Labour Code.

The ILO should significantly upgrade the services it provides to constituents, along the lines suggested by the Director-General. In this regard, I would particularly mention the need for the ILO to carry out and publish frank analyses on current labour and social issues, as well as the need for technical and policy guidance through wide dissemination of non-binding "soft-law" texts.

A second frame of reference is the ILO's place and authority in the international community.

Determined ILO action is required to better protect the fundamental rights of working people. The ILO must also pursue with vigour its claim for a place at the table in the international policy debate on economic issues. Without an effective ILO input, there is a grave risk that the social dimension of economic adjustment will be ignored.

The Director-General's proposals to strengthen the ILO's supervisory processes through establishing improved procedures in the areas of discrimination in employment, forced labour, child labour and a voluntary mediation and arbitration service deserve very constructive examination by the Governing Body.

Action is also required to strengthen the links between ILO standards and technical cooperation. This does not mean we should be making technical cooperation conditional upon standards being ratified or implemented. However, it does call for a mutual acceptance of certain commitments, such as the commitment to social progress which is inherent in ILO membership.

It is clear that the ILO's traditional approach in pursuing social justice and the protection of workers' rights through dialogue and persuasion must be maintained. The Director-General's proposals, if they prove acceptable to the ILO's constituents, do represent a significant step forward in strengthening this cooperative approach.

For pragmatic reasons, economic and political sanctions to enforce workers' rights have never been adopted by the ILO. It recognizes that there are no simple answers to these complex issues. Further research, analysis and reflection are required. The ILO must be an active participant in this process, together with other relevant international agencies.

However, there is one issue which is already clear. Free trade promotes economic development and provides the means to create jobs and improve working conditions. The substantial comparative advantage which developing countries derive from lower wage rates should not be blunted by attempts to introduce minimum wages into the debate on workers' rights.

On the question of unemployment, while the national government carries the main responsibility for finding answers to unemployment, the international debate is also critically important in our view. The liberalization of international trade offers reasonable possibilities for worldwide growth, employment creation and the alleviation of poverty. But there is no guarantee that greater social justice will automatically result.

The World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen next March provides a real chance to find effective ways to address the social aspects of economic trends and policies at the international level.

The ILO must ensure it is equipped to play a key role in guiding and influencing international policy development. It is uniquely well placed for this, given its universal membership, its tripartite structure, its machinery for developing and supervising standards, its principles and values, and its long operational experience.

In our view this is a decisive moment for the ILO. It can continue down the path of recent years, adopting some reforms but without fundamentally reassessing its role in the international community. Or it can seek a greater influence in labour and social affairs through revising its structures and demonstrating its capacity to make original and creative contributions to effectively promoting social justice, creating employment and alleviating poverty.

In our view, there is no real alternative to a bold and creative approach and the ILO, in our view, must grasp this opportunity.

Original French: Mr. MASTELLA (Minister of Labour, Italy) – I should like to join in offering congratulations to the President on his election to preside over this Conference, which is this year of particular importance. It is not by chance that the 75th anniversary of the ILO coincides with the placing of the topic concerning the role of the ILO at the centre of the Conference's deliberations.

To remain faithful to the original mandate means that it is now imperative to reaffirm the vitality of the values of the Organization in seeking new and more efficient types of action. This is a fundamental requirement in view of forthcoming events on the international scene, but it is also needed for reasons which stand on their own. The development of this idea within the Office and the initiatives taken by the Office itself confirm this.

The real problem has to do with the function of international labour standards as a vehicle to promote the individual and provide for his or her integration in society. It also concerns training in the field of economic and social development, structural adjustment programmes and the regulation of the international economy and international trade.

I would like to thank the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, who, by means of the valuable relations which are at the very core of the discussion of this Conference, has made an essential contribution to national and international discussions, by proposing feasible and effective solutions.

It is up to all of us to contribute to finding these solutions. The urgent question of employment leaves us no choice. It has now been understood, as the recent G7 meeting in Detroit demonstrates, that the serious employment problems which have been worsened by the economic crisis cannot be automatically resolved by the economic recovery alone. Appropriate policies must be implemented as well. The creation of skilled jobs must be an explicit aim of economic development and, in itself, a factor fuelling development.

The challenge we now face is to combine growth, competitiveness and employment, economic dynamism and social values. The International Labour Office has already done some useful work in this direction. We welcomed the Informal Ministerial Meeting on Employment, together with the discussion now in progress here on the role and the functions of our Organization. These discussions demonstrate an amount of awareness and at the same time are a step ahead in the field of coordination and interaction – which today is indispensable between national and international policies and between economic policy and employment policy.

The concrete solutions which have already been identified in national and international discussions, most of which have been included in the document drafted by the Office, are a very useful basis for a common operational programme which can be put to immediate use.

Because of the special characteristics of the economic crisis, there is no reason to call into question the role of the ILO. On the contrary, this role should be reaffirmed, and the importance of the Organization's drafting and application of standards to promote and protect labour should be highlighted. And this is true in particular because the more economic and employment problems become global, the more pertinent and authoritative are the observations made from a qualified, supernational and overall point of view.

The globalization of the economy and the delocalization of investments make it necessary to reconsider the relationship between individuals, institutions, the social partners and the regions of the world so that economic and social progress take place at the same pace and so that the spread of economic freedom is accompanied by the freedom which stems from universal observance of basic human rights, including those in the social field.

New rules are even more needed in a world which is loosening its borders and which is counting on the growth of free international trade as a premise for individual and collective progress.

The fact that we have put on the agenda part-time work and the role of employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets for domestic workers shows that we are on the right track. In Italy we have chosen flexibility in the working relationship to revive the economy while taking into account the needs of enterprises and of workers as lifestyles change. We are doing so without touching the basic reference framework within which these changes must take place – the guarantee of work and the protection of workers enshrined in the Constitution. The essential objective is to provide a concrete framework and some regulation for the growing demand for flexibility.

We thus should proceed along these lines at the international level, testing the suggestions which the Director-General made in his Report concerning the most effective ways to adopt standards, while first checking actual requirements and maintaining a creative attitude.

The evaluation of the impact of standards is extremely important. Of course, this involves taking account of both costs and benefits.

The principle and the methods of tripartism, which is the hallmark of the ILO, must be further strengthened. As far as Italy is concerned, tripartism serves as a reference. It is expressed in the recent tripartite Agreement on income policy of July 1993, which established the parties' objectives and commitments for all economic and employment policies.

The Agreement is in complete harmony with the ILO's proposals for the international events to take place in the near future. For proof of this, one may refer to the suggestions concerning income policies as an instrument of economic policy, to commitments to redistribute income through comprehensive anti-inflation policies or to active measures based on consensus aimed at increasing employment.

It is not possible to prepare different timetables for economic questions and social questions. The interaction of both is too great and all too obvious.

The next international events and in particular the World Summit for Social Development to be held in Copenhagen will be a golden opportunity to verify the ability of the ILO to work with other international institutions and especially with those which are active in the economic and trade field, including the World Trade Organization. The phase of occasional collaboration has served us well. It is now time to identify objectives for a closer and more regular form of common action.

With this in mind, I should like to say that the Report of the Director-General contains useful proposals, including the one for an annual employment policy meeting, the results of which are to be examined by the various committees which work on adopting new standards.

The time that has been allotted to me does not permit me to dwell on all the activities of the ILO and on other important fields of action, such as technical cooperation and training activities.

However, as regards training, I believe it is of absolute importance. Vocational training can and must be given a more important role in employment policy. If a major part of employment problems stems from the obsolescence of jobs as new technologies are introduced and production is reorganized, it is obvious that training must become more practical, operational and continuous both for those who are already on the labour market and should not be neglected and for those who are about to enter it and should do so with the appropriate means.

Permit me therefore, in concluding, to reiterate my personal support and also the support of the Italian Government for the activity of the ILO, and in particular, support for the Turin Centre, which has made great headway thanks to the efforts of its Director, whom I would like to thank.

Original in Spanish: Mr. ALBURQUERQUE DE CASTRO (Secretary of State for Labour, Dominican Republic) – The Report presented to us this year by the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, is a call for reflection, a message of warning and concern addressed to the constituents of the Organization who are invited to promote change in a global economy and at the same time called upon to defend social protection.

Never before, if I may say so, without in any way wishing to denigrate previous Reports and important pronouncements by earlier meetings, never before have we had as an essential topic for discussion and analysis a theme so intimately bound up with the very future of the Organization, and with the juridical discipline which emerged as an independent branch in 1919, namely labour law.

The question has been asked with absolute clarity. Is labour regulation admissible in an economy dominated by market forces? The presumed conflict between the opportunity to find work and labour law is a problem which is under discussion in all countries, and among certain social groups, and the International Labour Organization cannot and must not stand aloof from this discussion since it is the most appropriate forum for the expression and exchange of experiences and concerns in all matters pertaining to the transformations that have swept through the world of work bringing far reaching change through the effects of technological innovation, new management practices now being applied by enterprises and the flexibility of capital.

As is pointed out by the Director-General in his Report, the present age is dominated by the question as to "whether regulation and worker protection are deterents to employment, and conversely, whether deregulation and flexibility are valid means of promoting employment".

The response to these concerns is a matter of particular urgency for develolping countries, with their high rates of unemployment and sustained growth of the informal sector.

However, it should be pointed out, although there is no need for particular statistics since the realities are already widely known, that the labour costs in industrialized countries are significantly higher than those prevailing in the developing countries, and that the workers in those rich nations enjoy a level of protection and stability far superior to those available to wage earners in those nations which are struggling to achieve economic renewal.

It is understandable and admissible that the industrialized nations, faced with the persistent phenomenon of unemployment, should try to fight against it by making employment more precarious and by introducing flexibility into conditions of work.

On the other hand, developing countries like the Dominican Republic, with legislation that has been brought into line with the basic standards of international labour law, has never achieved, nor enshrined in its national labour legislation, standards that would prevent the conclusion of fixed-term work contracts or that would make absolute stability binding on entrepreneurs.

It is possible to make flexible that which is rigid, but it is absolutely inappropriate that simply by imitating what is taking place in the industrialized nations, the developing countries, with much lower labour costs, should go down the path of a deregulation which would only lead them to the old system of contracting services dominated by the rule that the will of the parties prevails, which in fact leads to the stronger party in the labour relationship taking the upper hand.

It was these considerations which impelled the Government, the employers and the workers in the Dominican Republic to draw up, by consensus, a new Labour Code which, far from taking the road of deregulation, set out to strengthen the individual rights of wage earners without falling into the excesses of rigidity which would fossilize labour markets.

It should be emphasized that the direction taken in the Dominican reforms, where market liberalization has gone hand in hand with social concerns, was possible only thanks to tripartism which made it possible for the social actors to intervene directly in the solution of their respective problems. Of course, the policy of negotiation and consensus did not in any way mean the disappearance of tensions between employers and workers. These differences are natural in a democratic society, and is inevitable and indeed constructive provided there are mechanisms and appropriate instruments available to ensure that dialogue prospers and that compromise can be reached.

Hence, the importance at this time of modernizing the structures of labour administration.

Given the globalization of the world economy characterized by the opening up of national markets and by other important phenomena, the Dominican Republic has undertaken a whole range of economic reforms which have led it to the adoption of a new tax code, new tariff regulations, a bill on foreign investments and a programme of industrial restructuring.

But, at the same time as change is being promoted, there is constant concern to ensure our integration in the market economy, without neglecting the values of social justice. And, to that end, we have not only approved the new Labour Code but we have also set about a very thorough reform of social security and we are putting into practice social contingency plans designed to protect the most vulnerable sectors of society.

All of these measures which began in 1990 inevitably reflect the influences of the political and geographical context in which the Dominican Republic finds itself. Our democracy will not have the perfection of the industrialized nations, but we are already very far from the time of the bands of guerilla fighters, from the tyranny that was laid low in 1961, from prisons and political exiles, from the suffocation of civic freedoms. Tourism and the free trade areas testify to the serious and sustained efforts that have been undertaken at the level of the Government and the people to consolidate our democracy. It would therefore be regrettable if this constant forward march were to be impeded by those who still fail to understand that we are a people with our own identity, with a culture and with traditions that are different from those who today need the assistance of the international community to overcome their domestic problems.

Social justice in a global economy must be the imperative of these times. That has been the understanding of the Dominican Republic, as has been demonstrated in its new Labour Code.

I would therefore congratulate the Director-General for the timeliness of his proposal to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, that it deal with the subject of social justice in a global economy which today requires that the gradual liberalization of markets go hand in hand with improvements in conditions of work.

There can be no better subject than this to commemorate the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, which should feel proud of its achievements and which has before it great tasks to carry out.

To the President of this Session of the Conference, my congratulations on his deserved election and my best wishes for success in conducting its proceedings.

Original Portuguese: Mr. FALCÃO E CUNHA (Minister of Employment and Social Security, Portugal) – Speaking on behalf of the Government of Portugal and in my own name, I should like to offer my congratulations on the excellent way in which the work and the Conference have been conducted.

The Report which the Director-General has given us for consideration has, as its central topic, social justice in the context of a global economy that is undergoing change.

The economic changes resulting from technical innovation will accelerate the entire process of the globalization of the economy, which I believe will have a positive impact on the development of societies and people.

The recent GATT negotiations are based on the premise that liberalization of trade with growing competition and new forms of international division of labour will also be beneficial to global growth and development.

This progress may, however, have negative effects which can result in unemployment and social exclusion.

Respect for human beings leads us to reject social exclusion and degrading living conditions to which the new poor are subjected, nor can we accept the existence of working conditions that undermine human dignity.

The defence of human dignity is an ethical and moral imperative. The solution for this is to be found in the essential tools of dialogue and social agreement which require active and steadfast participation by all social partners.

Tripartism, which is part of the tradition of this Organization and which depends on the agreed decisions of workers, employers and governments, has intrinsic virtues and values as represented by the progress achieved throughout the 75 years of the ILO's existence.

But it is no less clear that this model of tripartite international structure implies the principle of subsidiarity, which means that decisions should be taken at the level which is closest to that of those who are most affected by them.

I have no doubt that the application of tripartism at the national level is the best way to make compatible the requirements of production and distribution of wealth, the right to employment and the creation of employment.

Thus, from this point of view the role of the States in social dialogue is both that of promoting and moderating while being an active and discrete arbitrator and conciliator.

The States, owing to the nature of their functions, have a decisive role to play in bringing about social dialogue.

In this context, and as referred to by the Director-General in his Report, I believe that the standard-setting activities of the ILO will further consolidate and modernize existing standards in order to facilitate their acceptance by an increasing number of countries.

In the context of strengthening the application of these standards, the ILO supervisory system should continue to be based on technical competence and the political authority of its institutions.

The extensive experience of the ILO system in defending freedom of association and eliminating violations of freedom of association through the actions of the Committee on Freedom of Association is well known.

However, the scope of fundamental social rights is broader, and therefore the suggestion by the Director-General that we consider a supervisory procedure identical to that of the Committee on Freedom of Association for other fundamental social rights deserves our full attention.

The proposed system for supervising the application of Conventions concerning other fundamental social rights can eventually take shape as a programming principle for activities of the ILO and its member States – to protect the dignity of workers.

The problem of reconciling the improvement of working and living conditions and competition in the global economy is becoming increasingly urgent.

The development of trade gives evidence of the difficulties of economies of countries and regions which have improved working conditions and social protection the most, in contrast with those economies which subtract the cost of social justice from their products.

The consequences are well known. Businesses and financial resources tend to move to regions which have lower production costs. In the more developed countries there is increasing unemployment, along with a rise in the cost of social protection. A legitimate question therefore is to ask if those countries to which business and resources are moving are improving working conditions and social protection in accordance with the increase in their economic resources.

The improvement of social policies in the less developed countries, on the basis of the ILO's international instruments, should be promoted. However, we cannot ignore the negative effects that could potentially result from disproportionate levels of social protection in the light of available resources.

The social goals must be feasible. When social objectives are set too high, they will not be respected or else they will have an unacceptable effect on the economy and employment in these countries, giving rise to social instability which must be avoided.

The suggestion, therefore, of the Director-General to have a new international Convention through which some States would renounce the use of unilateral trade measures and others would commit themselves to improving social protection seems to be faced with substantial practical difficulties. Ultimately, it will depend on the willingness of States. One may well fear that it is insufficiently effective, to the point of removing the social clause from trade agreements, which would make trade conditional on certain minimum levels of social protection, independent of the ratification of Conventions.

These social clauses should not ignore the effects that they could have on exporting countries. Feasible social goals should be set that contribute to the balance of international competition.

While respecting the ILO's own rules, it is necessary to adopt universal Conventions that can be ratified and applied by the maximum possible number of States.

The problems of this strategy are quite complex and involve the procedures of the member States in preparing and adopting international instruments, the submission of those instruments to the competent national authorities, and ratification of Conventions. The solutions to be found must, above all, respect the ILO's tripartism and its constitutional provisions.

Thus, the ILO is maintaining a delicate but worthwhile task of making the discipline of a system for protecting workers, which seeks to become increasingly effective, compatible with the new realities of the international economy and the internal development of each country. This must be based on social reform which is effective, just and economically self-sustainable and self-sustained.

The system must be one which can generate employment and which can create solidarity among all.

The Portuguese Government will proceed multilaterally in order to contribute to the enshrinement of the international ILO standards, providing adequate protection and guarantees to all workers.

Along with the standard-setting role of the ILO, it has another basic role which is no less important – that of providing assistance in solving specific problems of employment.

In this area we have technical cooperation activities, through an active partnership policy. Technical cooperation is above all intended to strengthen the capacity of the member States in those areas within the ILO's competence.

Portugal has placed particular importance on international cooperation in the area of labour law, which can be seen through the many technical cooperation programmes in conjunction with the ILO.

Our cultural and linguistic ties with the five Portuguese-speaking countries of Africa have given us an opportunity to develop technical cooperation programmes as well as bilateral and multilateral ones.

We shall continue with these programmes which will, I am sure, enjoy the ILO's support. The ILO in turn can count on Portugal's efforts to promote the growth of the world economy and the respect of basic workers' rights.

Original Greek: Mr. YANNOPOULOS (Minister of Labour, Greece) – I am particularly happy to be here with you and I would like to express my most sincere congratulations to the President as well as to all the other Officers of the Conference on their election. I am convinced, as are all the other members of the Greek delegation, that your competence and experience will certainly ensure the success of our work.

I should also like to underline that the Report of the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, is marking a special point in the history of the International Labour Office. It is a document of great quality and noble aspirations which defines with success the priorities the International Labour Organization must pursue in order to take on the challenges of the twenty-first century.

Seventy-five years have elapsed since the creation of the International Labour Organization, the consequence and result of considerable efforts to bring about social peace throughout the world on the basis of social justice.

The ILO, which was given the Nobel Peace Prize in 1969 in recognition of its contribution, is the only example of an organization where workers, employers and governments work together on an equal footing.

Amongst the most urgent problems which the ILO was called upon to resolve following its inception were the eight-hour working day, social security, maternity protection, improvement of working conditions for women and children and the struggle against unemployment.

Today, 75 years later, the problem of unemployment is still as topical as ever.

A fact that I always mention – I did so at a recent conference at the Catholic University in Louvain and during ministerial meetings at the European Union, is that the economic recession of the past few years has shown that full employment, the welfare State and equal opportunities, far from having been attained, are being sorely tested.

Seventy-five years after the creation of the International Labour Organization, poverty, marginalization and unemployment are rampant. Over 150 million citizens throughout the world are unemployed; over 800 million inhabitants are suffering the ravages of underemployment. In the European Union alone there are 19 million unemployed, which is enormous. This is equivalent to a quarter of the world's population.

Unemployed people are legion and the trend is on the rise, especially if we continue with current policies. The reason is simple – we have not reached the level of economic development to sustain the level of employment.

The labour world is changing and losing its characteristic unity. The nature, the importance and the content of work are changing, as are employer-worker relations. Social disparities are growing, societies – even the most advanced – are experiencing previously unheard of forms of poverty, unemployment is marginalizing tens of millions of people, the figures of migrating populations – immigrants, refugees, displaced persons – are shooting up.

The risks of social degradation are tremendous. They come under the names of household crises, increased unemployment and crime, all forms of abuse and are in all fields – economic, political and social. Others include the explosion of the labour force and worldwide social upheavals.

In Europe alone, 52 million people live below the poverty line; on the global scale there are billions who do.

The question that arises, then, is the following: is it possible to reverse the trend and to create an acceptable form of society?

Before doing this we will have to clarify, firstly, what the real needs of our societies are and what they are prepared to accept; secondly, ways of ensuring employment for young people; thirdly, how to apply social protection; and fourthly, how to adapt current systems so as to ensure social integration.

It is only through social integration that we will be able to solve the other problems of so-called disadvantaged social groups – the young, the old, the disabled, immigrants, etc.

It would be wrong to imagine that one could really bring about economic development at the cost of a country's social well-being.

Of all policies, it is social policy, and social policy alone which can deal with the real problems of daily life: employment, social protection, working conditions, standard of living, dignity at work.

This is why social policy must always aim to eliminate inequalities on the labour market by upgrading and redeployment measures in order to ensure the flexibility necessary to combat exclusion.

The economic situation is certainly something we must bear in mind, but this does not necessarily mean that it must eclipse every other aspect. By definition it is a reflection of progress and development, whilst having its roots in solidarity and social justice.

Economic progress goes hand in hand with social progress; they are inseparable. The process of economic integration involves the improvement of living standards and of the applicable social model, not their deterioration.

It is inconceivable to consider giving priority to economic performance over social progress. Economic performance, expressed in abstract figures, is to no avail if it entails the reduction or suppression of social achievements won on the basis of considerable sacrifice.

The Western socio-economic model after the Second World War was based on the quest for full employment, and the welfare State was closely bound up with the ideals of democracy and respect for human rights. This is where its strength lies. Since the disappearance of the two antagonistic blocs, we are heading towards a new situation where the level of socio-economic development will play an even greater role than in the past.

The systematic political East-West confrontation – one of the main features of international relations, also at the ILO, over the past decades – has disappeared, and the usual differences between employers and workers have resurfaced. The collapse of Communism occurred at the same time as the return of neo-liberal doctrines which support free markets, private initiative and associated ideas: blame of the welfare State, privatization, flexibility, deregulation and hightening of the social burden.

The internationalization of the economy which is gaining momentum, especially after the successful negotiations within the framework of GATT, is a true challenge for the ILO. The Report of the Director-General notes – and I entirely share this view – that we are moving towards a convergence of economic policies at the global level; there is much proof of this: the development of international trade, large movements of capital, interlinking of financial markets, foreign investment, etc.

The Report is very eloquent on the influence of multinationals on the world economy – I note the figure of approximately 40,000 as compared to just over 7,000 20 years ago. Insertion in an international economy can also occur through international organizations with regional focuses, such as the European Union, NAFTA – uniting the United States, Canada and Mexico, and MERCOSUR – made up of Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay.

It is thus the global system as a whole that is changing, the elements of which are increasingly interdependent and show a trend to regroup on a regional basis as a means of ensuring lasting economic and social development.

It is well seen to say that the market economy is the only way to achieve development. However, can we really trust only the "invisible hand" of the market to solve the numerous problems that arise during the process of economic structural adjustment?

Or, to quote an expression dear to the famous American economist John Kenneth Galbraith, are we risking ending up with an extreme model where individual affluence exists alongside collective destitution? Are we risking experiencing once again the savage capitalism that we experienced at the start of the industrial revolution?

It is to avoid this risk that the fundamental values of the ILO must be recalled now more than ever, whether it be social justice, working conditions, the protection of vulnerable groups – like women, young people, the old, children, immigrants, etc. – freedom of association and respect of the dignity of the worker.

Social justice, the indispensable basis of all civilized societies, must be based on the equilibrium of relations between the State, the economy and individual.

Tripartism – workers, employers and governments – is an ideal framework to discuss and to deal in an efficient way with profound social changes, to formulate consensual policies at the international level, and to apply these policies, adapting them to the needs of socially acceptable economic development.

The European Union is about to take a decision regarding the type of society that it would like to see, and regarding the policies to apply to achieve both economic development and social progress.

You have probably seen or heard about the European Union's White Paper and Green Paper.

The White Paper on Growth Competitiveness and Employment proposes a series of medium-term policies aimed to maintain the competitiveness of the Union on the global level, while respecting its social models.

The Green Paper lays down the philosophy of a true social policy, an apology for human values. It is the cornerstone of workers' rights. The question concerns present and future social policy. And the question is not only a question for Europe, but for the whole world. What kind of society would we like to see? What policies must we implement to achieve this aim?

To have both employment and a satisfactory level of social protection cannot be the privilege of only the developed countries of the European Union. The problems and guidelines outlined in the Green Paper are applicable to all countries of the world. Those that have new practices in the labour field and those that are experiencing technological revolutions. I would go so far as to say that they are perfect for the developing countries and for the countries of Central and Eastern Europe which are currently experiencing a difficult period of their history.

Original French: Mr. BENHIMA (Government delegate, Morocco) – It is my agreeable duty to congratulate the President on the confidence expressed in him by this Conference by electing him to the chair of its 81st Session, which is taking place in a context that calls for an effort of reflection on our Organization's action to establish social justice. I am sure that – thanks to his experience and wisdom – our Conference will achieve better results and find appropriate solutions to all the questions under review.

I would also like to welcome the Sultanate of Oman, South Africa and the Republics of Tajikistan and Turkmenistan to our Organization. I am sure that these new Members will make a positive contribution towards strengthening the ILO's role.

I would also like to thank the Director-General of the ILO, who took the opportunity of the 75th anniversary of the Organization to submit to the Conference a series of proposals for strengthening the role of our Organization in a world that is grappling with the economic and social effects of the new international situation.

The future of our Organization depends on its ability to adapt to international change and to influence the course of events in such a way to ensure that they further the aims pursued by the ILO.

Our Organization has repeatedly demonstrated its capacity to modernize its working methods and its means of action by bringing them into line with the demands of the times. And it has been able to do so thanks to its tripartite structure, which enables it to remain in continuous contact with reality and to pursue its goals with greater drive and vitality.

One of the problems facing our Organization is the question of unemployment, which has been exacerbated by the impact of structural adjustment programmes and the liberalization of international trade, a development that has given rise to fierce competition, encouraging enterprises to demand greater freedom and flexibility in the management of their business and the administration of their human resources.

Bearing in mind the obligation to defend human dignity, which cannot be safeguarded without an employment policy that ensures a decent life for everyone, our Organization must seek appropriate formulas for striking a balance between the demands of economic development and the promotion of employment.

In this regard, we agree with the measures proposed by the Director-General, namely to produce an annual report on the situation of employment and income in the world and the impact of economic and financial policies, and to give these matters the status of permanent items on the Organization's agenda.

We consider that such measures will enhance the standing and the role of our Organization in determining the social aspects of economic policy and we consider that the ILO should have the means and the authority required to play that role.

While the high-level meetings held by the ILO on employment and structural adjustment policies have produced satisfactory results, they have had little real impact in the absence of international machinery for evaluating their results and monitoring the implementation of the decisions taken.

It is time to introduce such machinery, with the ILO playing a key role both in its establishment and in its functioning.

The International Labour Organization can only play such a role by continuing to adapt its structures and its means of action in such a way as to ensure that it can shoulder that responsibility.

To that end, the ILO needs to have a certain flexibility in administering the Organization's budget so that the activities and studies it undertakes remain topical and vigorous and, in particular, so that it can keep abreast of the constant changes in the world of work.

Turning now to the standard-setting work of the Organization, we believe that it is essential for that work to continue, given the constant changes in the world of work brought about by scientific and technical progress and its impact on working conditions and labour relations.

We consider that it is essential for ILO standard-setting work to be adapted to the real needs of member States, which need to be directly involved in the choice – by the Conference and not only by the Governing Body – of matters that are to be made the subject of a standard.

Furthermore, the ILO must update the older standard-setting instruments so that the provisions of those instruments that are still valid may be grouped together by subject-matter and classified in accordance with the areas dealt with and the aims pursued.

Furthermore, it is essential that there should be a choice of questions that are of concern to member States and that they should initially be formulated as Recommendations before being turned into Conventions. These Conventions should include flexibility clauses, both as regards their content and as regards their partial or gradual ratification, depending on the needs and possibilities of each State.

In this context, I should like to emphasize that labour legislation in Morocco is in line with a large number of the Conventions adopted by the Organization and this has made it possible for our Government to ratify 41 Conventions to date, while others are in the process of ratification or under study.

Technical cooperation is one of the main areas in which the ILO has played a vanguard role for the past half century, helping to carry out a variety of projects in a large number of countries.

As one of the means whereby the ILO attains its objectives, technical cooperation must, if it is to succeed, be based on new foundations adapted to the new strategy of international organizations involved in cooperation, a strategy dictated by the declining volume of official development assistance.

We feel that the best way of ensuring the success of technical cooperation is to identify, in cooperation with beneficiaries at the national level, the medium-term objectives to be pursued, while taking account of the needs expressed and their consistency with the values defended by the Organization.

The active partnership policy recently pursued by the ILO in the area of technical cooperation gives practical expression to this method and we wholeheartedly support this approach, in particular the establishment of multidisciplinary teams in the various regions. In order to make those teams more effective, their role should be confined to the provision of technical advice, while the preparation and implementation of projects should be gradually entrusted to national authorities.

The agenda of this session includes questions of importance, including part-time work, security and health in mines and the role of private employment agencies in the labour market.

We hope that the technical commissions set up to discuss these matters will produce constructive results that satisfy all the parties concerned.

Before concluding, I would like to reiterate my congratulations to the President, on his conduct of our proceedings and his tireless efforts to ensure the success of our Conference.

I would also like to pay tribute to the Director-General and the members of the Governing Body for their efforts to reach the goals set for our Organization.

Original Spanish: Mr. ROMERO NAVA (Employers' delegate, Venezuela) – I should like to begin by congratulating the President and the other Officers on their election to chair this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, in the year in which we are celebrating its 75th anniversary.

I should like to stress that my country, Venezuela, which at the time was an unknown place on the map in Latin America and suffering one of the worst dictatorships of that time, was nevertheless a founder Member of this very prestigious international organization with which the Venezuelan employers have always identified, both in terms of objectives and the ILO achievements. However, we realize that it is now vital, given the profound changes the world is undergoing to lay sound foundations upon which the ILO can redirect its activities in the light of the new realities. The world of 1919 is very unlike that of today. Totalitarian systems have been rejected by humanity and democracy and participation are spreading throughout the world. In recent years we have been witnesses to the success achieved by the ILO in bringing down systems which, in one way or another, had tried to enslave or discriminate against human beings for reasons of ideology, religion or race. If the contribution of the ILO had only been limited to that, humanity would still owe a crushing debt to the ILO.

We are speaking before this assembly to tell us that we, the Venezuelan employers, believe that this body – which is remarkable on account of its tripartite structure – still has major goals to achieve in a world where many people are hoping and demanding that the fruits of modernization be shared on an equitable basis. We must, once and for all, do away with poverty and marginal living; and therefore we believe that all the ILO's positive experiences should be harnessed to promote and establish genuine bases for employment opportunities, individual development, stimulation of investment and entrepreneurship, which encourage employment development.

We have carefully studied the Report which the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, has submitted to us, and we once again would like to extend to him our special greeting which we already had the opportunity to do when he visited Venezuela. As always, his Report is a document which enables us to make constructive criticisms so that we can preserve values and promote change with equity in the context of a global economy.

Economic freedom and political freedom are indivisible and have to operate together.

I would like to refer to the statement drawn up at the recent Seventh Meeting of Presidents of Companies in Latin America which was recently held in Cartagena. It concluded that experience has shown that sustained expansion of employment arose from solid economic growth based on the following conditions: stable and coherent management of macroeconomic policies; a political environment that stimulates and allows enterprises to be set up and prosper in a competitive market; stable regulations; respect for private property; and a flexible regulatory framework that allows employers and workers to adapt to economic changes.

Therefore, Venezuelan employers agree that the time has come for the ILO to consolidate its achievements to date; in particular to revise and adjust international labour standards which have served as the point of reference for minimum legislation in many countries. We feel that the limited economic resources of the ILO should be directed towards expanding programmes of technical cooperation and improving management of human resources, particularly in those countries which are suffering badly from poverty, unemployment, inflation and a growing informal economy.

We thus set aside any belief in class war and hold that the objectives of a country, such as ours, particularly under the current conditions, requires cooperation among the social partners on the basis of tripartism, which is the cornerstone of this important international Organization. We support tripartism as a dynamic and participatory mechanism for identifying problems, establishing priorities and establishing options that will bring about concerted action to try to solve the difficult situations that limit our development, and to ensure that high living standards are available to all – to which our citizens legitimately aspire. We feel that this tripartism should not be confused with other mechanisms that could be useful for the analysis and attempt to seek solutions in different forms. We recognize the undeniable importance of contributions from other parts of society to these ends, and we reiterate the need to renew existing tripartism which has always characterized the ILO. Nothing should in any way weaken this tripartism, because it would undermine the very basis of the ILO.

We congratulate the Director-General for acting upon the idea put forward by the Latin American Employers' Group by setting up the multidisciplinary teams – which recently began to work. We are confident that an adequate combination of technical support, on the basis of the extraordinary work carried out by the Turin Centre, and a renewed tripartism, will allow these teams to help to identify and resolve those situations which in some countries are still undermining labour relations – to the detriment of the promotion of productive employment, necessary investment and strengthening in the real wages of citizens. This is the case of our country where, as is well known, within a democratic regime of freedom, we have submitted a complaint to the ILO against the Government of Venezuela with the support of the International Employers' Organization, because we believe that the Labour Code of 1991 violates certain international Conventions which have been ratified by our country. The text might have been drafted with good intentions; but circumstances have demonstrated that it does not contribute to solving labour problems and promoting more productive employment and improved living standards. We are confident that our new Government, which is headed by an illustrious Venezuelan who, as a jurist, is closely linked to the ILO, will develop the means in order to enable us to find solutions for the complaints that FEDECAMARAS has quite correctly made.

As is well known – and in many cases this has been exaggerated – there are many problems affecting Venezuela; but all of them have a short-term solution to the extent that we can take advantage of the technical assistance of the ILO, national and international investment, and the wealth which we have in Venezuela; indeed, we have some 62 billion barrels of oil, without taking into account the tremendous reserves of the Orinoco. The difficult experiences of our country in the last 40 years have not enabled us to build upon our real values and tap our potential. We are trying as hard as we can to combat corruption in all its forms. And all Venezuelans are committed to the modernization of our society and of its most basic social and legal instruments. We are also in the process of renovating and improving – with success – our efforts to democratize the education system and to promote social mobility. In fact, social mobility is probably the most important factor, which offers security and confidence to nationals and foreigners alike investing in Venezuela both to meet the needs of the market as well as to establish a source of production for international trade. In this way, they can take advantage of our excellent geographical position, human resources, energy resources, climate, communications and positive experiences with very prestigious multinational and national enterprises.

Our country has historically been closely related to international investment. Venezuela has been, and continues to be, a country which offers opportunities to everyone. Venezuela is today, by virtue of its demographic configuration and the nature of its citizens, a result of crosses and combinations of diverse nationalities, cultures, religions and origins.

Venezuela is a country in which we are committed to promoting structural change within a pluralist and full democracy, with a willingness to establish and develop a market economy that will allow us to meet the demands of the various political parties by creating employment, which is worthy and well paid. Venezuela is a country where we have tried to promote small and medium-sized enterprises in order to give opportunities to Venezuelans and to any skilled foreigners who are willing to work. Venezuela is a country where there is a great potential for tourist development. Venezuela is a country in which the social partners are dynamic, where we respect each others' areas of operation and where the Government, the employers and the workers are jointly committed to upholding freedom of association, with the conviction that this is an important way to achieve development, productive employment, equity, justice and confidence.

The Venezuelan employers are very proud and satisfied to have contributed to the creation of the ILO, and on the occasion of the 75th anniversary we are confident that we will be able to meet the new needs of a global and interdependent world.

You can count on the firm support of the Venezuelan employers in helping to bring about the success of the next 75 years of the ILO, certain that this will help to realize the hopes of our peoples.

Original Spanish: Mr. FERRER DUFOL (Employers' delegate, Spain) – I would like to begin by congratulating the President on his election. I should also like to welcome those countries which have joined our Organization this year. I am certain that their membership of the Organization will significantly enrich our discussion.

I should also like to congratulate the Director-General for the Report he has presented to the Conference. Its title suggests that, during the plenary session, we will have an extensive debate on the future of our Organization . Yet, while this future will certainly be full of difficulties and uncertainty, it will also provide opportunities in a global context of fundamental change, be it political, economic or social. Employers, and especially those in Spain, have every intention of actively participating in this debate; thus, the Conference will be but a first, although important, step. They will continue to pursue this work shortly, together with the Governing Body, to develop the contributions made by the three groups both at this session and future sessions of the Conference.

The 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO is certainly an opportune time for this; however, it is also certain that we would have had to take up this task even without the anniversary because, as the Director-General has said, the size and rapidity of recent geopolitical convulsions – together with their social and economic consequences – must necessarily bring about a review of the ILO's priorities and working methods.

The majority of the highly advanced countries are currently re-examining their social laws, seeking, on the one hand, greater flexibility and, on the other, a greater role for employers and workers through collective bargaining within the framework of labour standards. Hence, we need to review the existing role played by international and national standards and laws, in the labour market. It would be counterproductive if the effort that has been made nationally were to be impeded by standards proposals reflecting historical situations which are, fortunately, no longer applicable in most countries, and which therefore require revision.

Any attempt to reverse this move to greater flexibility by artificial protectionist measures can only bring about unemployment and endanger the viability of social protection mechanisms.

Fiscal measures involving new levies on undertakings would be a break on the economic growth expected by many of our citizens – and in particular young people wishing to enter the labour market.

It is widely agreed that job creation – an objective shared by all – has to stem from competitiveness on the part of undertakings, whilst safeguarding workers' rights that are part and parcel of our social culture.

Consequently, the institution of training activities by employers and workers can make a large and positive contribution – especially in the area of retraining and the initial training of young people. Technological progress and the creativity it generates will compel employers, workers and society as a whole to bear constantly in mind the need for ongoing training.

Perhaps one of the most basic changes in recent years has been the crisis of planned economies and the welfare state, and the recognition of the market economy as a universally accepted standard. The Director-General gives due recognition to this in the first pages of his Report, in acknowledging that this is a new factor in the history of the ILO and that, in this new context, private enterprise has a decisive role to play.

We feel that this statement of principle is not at all reflected in the rest of the Report. This is a shortcoming we regret not only because it affects the Employers' group, one of the three pillars of the Organization, but also because this failure to emphasize the values of enterprise in fundamental aspects of the future action of the ILO (such as job creation, improvement of human resources, etc.) undoubtedly limits the debate on the future of these activities.

I am quite certain that other speakers will raise this point during the plenary sessions and that subsequent debate within the Governing Body will pay due heed to the role of enterprises in national economic and social development. In doing so, the ILO would merely be following the guidelines adopted by other United Nations agencies.

Globalization of the economy and the world trade liberalization will facilitate free circulation of goods, services, capital and technology at a speed unimaginable only a few years ago, and will allow countries to maximize their comparative advantages. This will permit more efficient use of the resources, and enhance their competitiveness and profitability; this in turn will bring about economic growth and, as a result, the creation of new productive employment opportunities.

I should like to refer as well to that section of the Report dealing with international labour standards with which the Director-General began his analysis of the future of the ILO. It is true, as stated in the Report, that we should be proud of the contribution made, in the past, by international standards – and in particular, certain fundamental standards such as Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, and other more technical conventions – in the economic and social development of our countries. However, it is also true that, in recent years in particular, the level of ratifications of Conventions has fallen to very, very worrying levels; this should make us reflect for the future on both the content of standards, the way they are prepared and the part they have to play in ILO activities.

The Employers have recently submitted both to the other groups as well as to the Office itself a document on the future of standards, and we are quite certain that this will receive due consideration in the discussion that will take place shortly in the Governing Body. The Conference should also perhaps study this topic.

I should now like to mention some aspects I think are particularly important. At the present time, when, throughout the world, the need for greater flexibility in labour relations is being recognized it is essential that new ILO Conventions incorporate this flexibility concept. There is no doubt that the growing complexity and rigidity of the Conventions is an obstacle to their ratification. Given this, and in the search for the same criteria of flexibility, we need to launch the revision of certain Conventions which have a poor ratification record in order to adapt them to new realities. I refer here, for example, to certain aspects of ILO standards on social security which are difficult to apply in the current context in many countries.

It is essential, as suggested by the Report, that we strengthen the operation and evaluation of these standards and this implies rigorous supervision of their implementation. But this is not sufficient for assessing the value of the standards in the light of the situation in member countries or for identifying those which are outdated.

Economic conditions are not an excuse for a country to fail to meet the obligations they have voluntarily accepted. However, an in-depth study of the reasons for non-ratification and the insufficiencies in implementation should permit permanent adaptation of the ILO's legislation system. Today, more than ever before, we need a procedure for revising and adapting international standards.

Finally, I would like to refer to the procedure for selecting the topics for future Conventions – a procedure which leads us to include new topics, more by exclusion than by consensus agreement among the groups. In our view, the final decision should be taken by the Governing Body, however, this should be on the basis of a broader list of topics selected on previously agreed criteria. This will probably require general discussion in the Conference on the future of the standard-setting policy.

I should like to conclude by a brief reference to the social clause – an important topic for many sectors which should receive priority consideration within the new World Trade Organisation.

(Mr. Gray takes the Chair.)

Original French: Mr. AG ERLAF (Minister of Employment, Public Service and Labour, Mali) – On behalf of the Government of my country, my delegation and myself, I should like to associate myself with preceding speakers in congratulating the President on his election to this high post at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that through his wisdom and perceptiveness our work will enjoy great success. My congratulations also go to the Officers of the Conference and I pay tribute to them for the trust that has been placed in them.

With your permission, I would like to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate the Governing Body and the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the excellent content of the Report submitted to us.

The present Session takes place at a very important moment in the life of the Organization. The 75th anniversary of its inception and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia come at a moment of economic, social and political crisis in the world. It is for this reason the Director-General's Report is of such interest.

The document conjures up for ILO constituents every aspect of the challenges that have to be taken up by our Organization. There are indeed many values to defend. But we also have reforms to make.

The scope of the global world economy concerns us all. It must encourage investigation of the best ways and means to put the objectives of the Organization into practice. This is why my Government believes that the ILO should equip itself in such a way as to be able to intervene and make sure that the many aspects of social justice are taken into account. Such an undertaking is within our means, even if we have to rethink working methods and adapt existing means of action.

One of the oldest and most important functions of the ILO is its legislative role. The Government of Mali, in the face of the various questions raised by the Organization's standard-setting activities is of the view that suspending the elaboration of new standards would amount to depriving the ILO of one of its most effective means of sustaining the momentum of progress and social dialogue.

The stagnation in ratifications is certainly a cause for concern. However, my Government, in its belief that this is not a reflection of a lack of common will to meet the ILO's fundamental principles believes that all our energies should be directed towards the following. Firstly, we should continue in our efforts to revise and update standards that are no longer relevant. Secondly, we must revise certain Conventions which many countries have failed to ratify on account of their rigidity or demands.

At this level, Conventions should provide a general framework. It is for Recommendations to fill in the necessary details. In this undertaking, the general surveys carried out by the Committee of Experts would certainly make an invaluable contribution.

Moreover, we support the proposals that the Governing Body or the Conference should, however often we decide, hold a general discussion on what is impeding the ratification of certain Conventions, to give us a better idea of the impact of this standard-setting activity.

I avail myself of this opportunity, on the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia to announce officially that my country has ratified the following instruments: Conventions Nos. 151, 135, 159 and 141.

I am convinced that none of the planned reforms will be successful unless we strengthen the tried and tested tripartite machinery. For this reason every member State must commit itself to doing this and adopt it as a guiding, practical and constant principle. There should also be a campaign to ensure recognition of the principle at the international level so that mobilizing social actors in this way can be used to promote the common good.

My Government notes once again, with great satisfaction, the efforts that have been made in the field of technical cooperation. However, the present situation in Africa, which is characterized by a move towards democratization and currency devaluation requires urgent action.

With your permission, I would like to congratulate the ILO on its initiative to organize in the near future a tripartite seminar on measures to complement the devaluation of the CFA franc in Africa.

I would also like to congratulate the ILO on its activities in the framework of preparations for the World Summit for Social Development. It is also with great satisfaction that my delegation finds that part-time work, safety and health in mines and the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets have been included on the agenda. My country, having already passed legislation in this regard, holds out great hopes for the Conferences debates. The discussion on the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets is undoubtedly the opportunity for us all to give our objective opinions on this issue.

For its part, since 1991, the establishment of private employment agencies to operate alongside the National Employment Office, in the framework of a flexible labour market, has been authorized in Mali.

My delegation believes that mixed management models for the labour market are essential. We therefore hope that the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No.88), the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No.96) and the Employment Service Recommendation, 1948 (No.83) will be reviewed with a view to adopting a new standard.

The Government of the Republic of Mali welcomes the developments in the political situation in South Africa and the occupied Arab territories.

A page in the history of South Africa has been turned once and for all with the election to the Presidency in a spirit of reconciliation of Mr. Nelson Mandela, a legendary figure in the fight against apartheid.

At this solemn time, I am pleased to be able to pay a glowing tribute to the international community, particularly the ILO, for the efforts made to promote a new united, free and democratic South Africa. In view of the strengthening of this embryonic democracy, my Government believes that we should suspend the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia so that the plan of action for ILO assistance can be implemented.

The commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the Organization affords us the opportunity to reiterate our unfailing commitment to the ideals of peace and social justice we have always defended.

Mr. ALVARENGA (Workers' delegate, Paraguay) – In the few years since we arrived in Geneva after a long absence of Paraguayan workers from the annual Conferences of the ILO, an absence willed and decreed by the former dictatorship, we can say quite frankly that the workers of Paraguay appreciate the enormous difference between dictatorship and democracy.

We are therefore determined in our country to banish every trace of dictatorship and to lay the foundations of a democracy based not only on politics but also on the economic and social dimensions.

But our country is not an island. Like other countries in the southern hemisphere, we are exposed to the reactionary backlash of those who want to halt the advance of the trade union movement and have no scruples about appealing to the military to protect them by a coup d'état, although such remedies are becoming more and more a thing of the past.

In our country too, the fight for democracy in this brief five-year period and especially in the past few months has taken its toll of human life. Assassinations of peasant leaders and death threats against urban trade union leaders are the order of the day. Those who previously enjoyed privileges are afraid of losing their positions and are prepared to go to any lengths to preserve them.

Although there are still a few rare cases such as the leaders of the transport trade union, hardly anybody is arrested nowadays for organizing the workers and claiming legally established rights. However, dismissals on grounds of union activities continue and hundreds of thousands of trade union activists and leaders are still victimized by employers while the Government stands idly by.

Most strikes have been called to force compliance with the law. Of course, the Ministry of Labour, which may be viewed as the Cinderella of all ministerial portfolios, cannot hope to secure countrywide compliance with the legislation on behalf of workers with only some 20 inspectors. At the same time, however, it cannot be exonerated of all responsibility.

While the Constitution has for the past two years finally given public-sector employees, except the military and the police, the right to organize, bargain collectively and call a strike, civilian employees of the navy shipyard, who are not even military employees, are victimized and denied the right to form trade unions and to collective bargaining.

Blacklists, the giving of carte blanche and pressure to disband trade unions are everyday topics. Entrepreneurs flout the law to such an extent that the Government had to enter into negotiations with the public transport employers to secure compliance with labour law. At this very moment, strikes are under way in the transport branch to prevent dismissals of trade union leaders and to secure observance of the eight-hour day.

However incredible it may sound, we still have examples of feudalism in Paraguay at the end of the twentieth century. We are referring to a coffee plantation run by a group of very shady Brazilian entrepreneurs, who respect no law but their own. Armed supervisors, death threats against union leaders and the flouting of labour laws are examples of what we mean. The Paraguayan State has not yet set foot in this feudal stronghold but trade union leaders place their lives at risk each day fighting for compliance with the law.

There is also an Argentine state enterprise, Banco de la Nación, that refuses to respect the principle of collective bargaining and victimizes trade union leaders.

In spite of all this, the trade union movement has grown at a spectacular rate. It has grown notwithstanding the reactionaries who oppose greater democracy in Paraguay.

After our organizational effort in the period of just under five years since the fall of the dictatorship, the three labour congresses, the CUT, the CNT and the CPT, organized and carried out the first general strike in 36 years. Support for the strike was put at 85 per cent by the international news agencies (which are logically neutral in such disputes). The country came out on strike to demand respect for workers' rights, a wage rise of 40 per cent and an offensive against corruption and smuggling.

Contrary to what the supporters of privatization would have us believe, namely that corruption in the public sector can be solved through privatization, we say that the private sector in Paraguay is just as corrupt or even more corrupt than the public sector and that the solution to the country's economic problems does not lie in that direction. The real problem is the impunity with which those involved in corrupt practices are treated. There are extremely high rates of double bookkeeping and tax evasion.

Smuggling is another plague of our society. Only one-third of imports and exports are legal. Two-thirds are controlled by the underworld of smuggling. This not only depletes the coffers of the State but also severely affects Paraguayan industry, depriving us of thousands of jobs each year. Smuggling continues to be the business preserve of a small number of mafioso bosses, who have networks and tentacles throughout the country.

Agricultural reform continues to be wishful thinking: 351 persons own a total of 100,000 square kilometres (a quarter of our national territory and twice the area of some European countries such as Denmark). In the meantime, there are 300,000 landless peasants who have to emigrate to neighbouring countries in search of work or who settle on the outskirts of the capital city of Paraguay, living in severely overcrowded conditions.

The minimum legal wage has dropped by 42 per cent relative to inflation over the past five years. In the wake of the strike, we are therefore negotiating with the Government a substantial wage adjustment that will enable us to recover our purchasing power. Obviously, however, this is only one negotiating point inasmuch as job creation and the attraction of new investment will not take place unless the Government takes serious steps to fight corruption. The offensive against smuggling (which the Government launched following the strike, although we cannot tell how long it will last) should, if vigorously pursued, bring in greater tax revenue that could be channelled into social programmes and provide conditions of greater stability for companies that wish to go about their business honestly.

Agricultural reform is also vital for economic recovery. With regard to labour legislation, the Paraguayan trade union movement has made considerable strides by preserving certain rights that prevent the imposition of uncontrolled flexibility and winning other collective rights such as the right to organization and collective bargaining and the right to strike. In spite of all contrary pressure, worker mobilization has succeeded in obtaining approval of a new Labour Code, which may be viewed as a positive development. The next step is to see that it is respected.

In spite of the prophets of doom, who predicted grave consequences for the economy from the new Labour Code, we find nine months after its introduction that the Paraguayan economy has not foundered.

There is food for thought here. Under the dictatorship, there was de facto flexibility because hardly anybody respected the law. But the country did not achieve prosperity, quite the contrary. In our view therefore, and in the light of our experience, those who believe in labour flexibility as a way of reactivating the economy are seriously mistaken.

Lastly, we should like to review the ILO's role in Paraguay in recent years. It has helped to restore links between the Paraguayan trade union movement and the international world of work. But underdevelopment is evident in all aspects of life and in all sectors. The workers certainly need training and education but the Paraguayan employers need them even more, although they lack the modesty to admit it. Only a minority of Paraguayan employers look to the future with any perspicacity. The great majority remain in isolation, still believing that the only key to success for a company is repression of trade unions and infringement of labour laws. The ILO needs to become more involved in the development and education of Paraguayan employers.

To sum up, the Paraguayan trade union movement has emerged from the catacombs to which it was confined during the Stroessner dictatorship and is now publicly and actively involved in the country's affairs. The fight for democracy continues every day. The right to vote freely and even freedom of expression are not enough unless they are accompanied by basic economic and social rights.

We do not hold the civilian Government responsible for all the evils that were perpetrated during the dictatorship. We do severely criticize it and hold it responsible for the fact that very little has been done to remedy those evils and to ensure that the rule of law prevails by opposing those who still have the dictatorship mentality – admittedly a very difficult task because the continuity can be observed in the circles of power, where we see the same elements which were prominent under the dictatorship.

Original French: Mr. BROCKA (Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family, Slovakia) – On behalf of the delegation of the Slovak Republic, and on my own behalf, I have the honour to congratulate the President on his election to the Presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, and to wish him much success in carrying out this difficult task.

I have the honour, at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, publicly to support the mission of the International Labour Organization, consisting in its work to strengthen fundamental human rights in the workplace. We are pleased to see that the International Labour Organization is influencing the mechanism of the world economy with success and in a timely fashion. I am well aware that the ideal of full employment is very difficult to achieve in the present circumstances. But I am convinced that the process of transformation through which the Slovak Republic is now passing will pick up speed in the near future.

In 1990 and 1991 Slovakia succeeded in a very short time in creating a national network of labour offices which are functioning relatively well. These offices are provide mediation and job consultation services free of charge for all concerned – for the unemployed, employers, people wishing to change jobs and for those who are threatened with dismissal.

The work of these labour offices is regulated by a single body of legislation and is coordinated on the national level.

From the outset we were aware that, given the relatively high levels of unemployment running at 14 per cent, the state employment services could hardly hope to meet the dynamically changing needs of the labour market as it was being established.

That is why in accordance with ILO Convention No. 96 of 1949 we set up the conditions for the operation of private employment agencies, both profit making and non-profit making.

Although these agencies have not yet become numerous, we welcome the decision to place on the agenda of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference the question of private employment agencies. We are looking forward to hearing new suggestions for the development of private employment agencies and for the dismantling of the monopoly on the labour market which will follow.

The experiences of other countries has shown that part-time work can play an important role in an active employment policy. It is for that very reason that the Slovak Republic is in the process of preparing a basic reform of its labour legislation.

The new labour regulation will provide for full legal protection of work where the number of hours worked is not less than one-third of the weekly working hours established by law. That means that the legal protection afforded to part-time workers will be the same as for full-time workers. In the event of part-time work carried out under a labour contract and which is less than one-third of the working hours established by law, the scope of the legal claims that may be made by the worker will be reduced. This reduction will mainly concern a lesser degree of legal protection in the case of dismissal by the employer and limitations to workers' rights to paid leave.

Despite the fact that our Republic is new, we have centuries of experience in the field of mining. Some time ago the territory of the Slovak Republic hosted the Mining and Forestry Academy, which was the first college of its kind anywhere in the world. Given the dangerous and hazardous nature of mining as an occupation, our legislation provides an obligation to create work safety and operational safety units. Detailed legal regulations for occupational safety and the exercise of this high-risk occupation has long offered a high level of protection to workers. The bodies of the State Mining Administration, which monitor observance of safety regulations at work and the operation of mines, are independent of the mine owners.

We consider social peace as essential for the democratic renewal of our country. That is why we are concerned with the question of tripartism. The International Labour Organization for its part also regards these matters as being of fundamental importance. Our confidence in this idea was expressed in the initiative to organize the European Conference on Tripartism in Bratislava to be held this September. We are certain that in today's world, a world of change, tripartism is justified at a number of different levels of social life.

Much remains to be done to stabilize our society, and this is particularly true in the regions where the problems I have mentioned are concentrated.

I would like now to thank the International Labour Organization for defending and spreading universal values which contribute even in our society to general stability in a time of transformation. It is in our interest to continue cooperating with the International Labour Organization and to assume all the obligations deriving from our membership.

Original Polish: Mr. MILLER (Minister of Labour and Social Policy, Poland) – On behalf of the Government of the Republic of Poland, and the tripartite Polish delegation, I should like to congratulate the President on his election to preside over the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I hope that the work of the Conference will be crowned with success and to the satisfaction of all, at a time when we are celebrating two anniversaries at the ILO.

I should also like, as the speakers preceding me have done, to welcome the new members to our Organization. I particularly welcome the tripartite delegation of the Republic of South Africa, which, after 30 years of absence, has once again joined the ILO.

Every anniversary incites us to take stock of the situation and to look into the future. It is not easy to make an exhaustive evaluation of the positive role the International Labour Organization has played these past 75 years in the construction of today's world. It is also just as difficult to point out how it is going to evolve and what will be its methods of action, in a world that is developing in a dynamic way.

And this is precisely what the Director-General of the International Labour Office has tried to do in the Report he has submitted to this Conference. I hope he will accept our congratulations for this very important and precious document. I am sure that it will be relevant for many years to come.

The Report underlines the role that the Organization has been playing and will continue to play – i.e. promoting and protecting human rights and values which constitute the cornerstone of this Organization.

One of the main activities of ILO is its standard-setting, which forms the basis of international labour law. I believe this is a most important realization of the twentieth century.

The Organization is based on the principle of tripartism. In market economy countries, tripartism constitutes the very basis of the labour system based on social dialogue.

The construction of a new labour system is a great challenge which the countries of Central and Eastern Europe are facing in a period of political, economic and social transition.

During this session of the International Labour Conference, the Polish Parliament is discussing new labour legislation, with a view to bringing it in line with the requirements of the market economy.

In 1991 the Polish Parliament adopted a new law which, for the very first time, laid the foundation for the creation of employers' organizations and regulated the transition of workers' associations into trade unions, as well as collective bargaining, according to international standards. It is no longer possible to call a strike against the Government to exert pressure, because the Government is no longer the employer. A collective dispute can only take place when there are grievances against an employer or employers' organization. In this way, the Parliament has created a legal basis for tripartism, permitting the Government to play a new role in collective labour relations.

The first tripartite negotiations in Poland of 1993 brought about an important social agreement called a "Covenant for State enterprise in the process of change". This Covenant, defines the framework acceptable and necessary for the privatization of the economy and the social reforms required for this transition. One of the most important results of this Covenant has been the enactment, at the beginning of this year, of an act on the protection of claims of workers in the case of insolvency, in line with the Protection of Workers Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173).

The Government follows and applies the principle of tripartite cooperation with the social partners. For a number of months in Poland we have had negotiations on the level of social guarantees for the citizens which will result in a social agreement. In February the tripartite Committee for Social and Economic Affairs was established. In Poland it is the first forum which has been institutionalized for permanent negotiations on problems concerning the entire society and the various socio-occupational groups. In the near future, the prestige of the Committee will be consolidated by special legislation voted by Parliament. It will also cover provisions concerning the representativity of trade unions, in conformity with ILO standards.

The Polish Government considers that such forms of tripartite consideration is a prerequisite for economic development in social peace. However, the framework cannot be created by bipartite negotiation and negotiations with one union, even if it has the greatest of merits.

The dynamic character of the trends in today's world calls for new forms of work within our Organization. The proposals for action contained in the Report by the Director-General should be subject to examination of the Governing Body.

In the future, the Organization's role in arbitrating collective disputes or intervening when ratified Conventions fail to be observed will take on a new dimension. Proposals of new solutions for the support and control of fundamental social rights, should not, I believe, be of a coercive nature. These are never effective.

The policy of active partnership will help to improve the efficacity? of technical cooperation, so that it is increasingly in line with the needs of beneficiary countries. Rivalry seems to monopolize some areas of cooperation, which acts as a brake on assistance and reduces its efficacity? We should try to harmonize and simplify the procedures and the forms of granting assistance. The ILO is not going to solve these problems alone. It must also work with the Bretton Woods institutions, UNDP, OECD, the European Union and other regional organizations.

The social cost of the process of transformation is giving rise to increasing anxiety. One of the most acute problems is unemployment and the poverty in which millions of people live. Measures to solve this problem are now before the Polish Parliament in a governmental programme called "Strategy for Poland".

The reduction of unemployment and the fight against its negative effects are being given priority. An example of cooperation in this area is the technical assistance programme carried out by the ILO in Poland, funded by the Swiss Government.

The end of the Uruguay Round of GATT constitutes a turning point in economic and social history. The globalization of the economy is resulting in many national States gradually shirking their responsibilities to workers. The development of supranational corporations is making it difficult for workers to have contact with their employers. These trends are justifiably giving grounds for concern in the world of work; proposals are being made to include social clauses in economic agreements to create new structures for the respect of workers' rights.

We must avoid a duplication of competence in the fields of action of international institutions. I am in favour of reinforcing the importance of the ILO, with a view to increasing its standard-setting activity and supervisory machinery. This would also imply that its constituents shoulder a greater responsibility.

We welcome the opportunity to exchange opinions on social problems within the framework of the World Summit for Social Development to be held next year.

I hope that the first findings of this Summit will be discussed at the Fifth European Regional Conference of the ILO.

It is with satisfaction that I took note of the Governing Body's decision to ask Poland to organize this conference. It is with great pleasure that we are going to receive you next year in Warsaw.

(Original Arabic) Mr. JASSIM (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs a.i., Iraq) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! The Iraqi delegation wishes to congratulate the President of the Conference, the Vice-Presidents, and Chairmen of the Committees on their election to their posts. Their experience and wisdom will ensure the success of this session.

The theme chosen by the Director-General for his Report Defending values, promoting change is of exceptional importance given the present international and regional situation. The Organization must now play an active and major role in studying the economic and monetary policies and measures to have emerged out of the changes in the world, and formulate resolutions and recommendations which will contribute to achieving social justice and defend the values and principles embodied in the Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The tremendous political and economic changes witnessed in the world today should not take place at the expense of fundamental values. The phenomena and problems which have resulted from the developments require discussion to ensure equity, achieve social justice and find solutions to the new forms of poverty, to increasing unemployment facing developing countries thanks to delays in implementing development programmes,growing debts, the deterioration of the economic situation, and the power wielded by certain well-known economic blocs, who are distorting the world economy to reflect their vested interests and objectives, which violates the principles and the objectives of our Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia which states that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere", and that unrelenting efforts should be made to ensure prosperity for all.

Our agenda this session is rich in very important topics and themes which aim to improve the conditions of employment and set international labour standards which can help arrive at social justice and peace throughout the world. As for part-time work, we fully support the importance given to this. It requires examination and the adoption of a legal instrument to establish the mechanics through constructive dialogue between the social partners attending this session of the Conference .

We agree on the need to study the question of safety and health in mines and establish effective legal rules in that regard.

The Conference will also look at the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. My country has supported the legitimate struggle of the people and workers of South Africa against apartheid. It has always called for their rights to be respected and their demands to be met.

The legitimate struggle of the people of South Africa, the just and fair support of all peaceful and freedom-loving States of the world and the international organizations, in particular the ILO, have enabled the people of South Africa to reach their goals, recover their legitimate right to self-determination and the right to take power into their own hands.

On behalf of my country's Government, I warmly congratulate the people and workers of South Africa on having won their legitimate rights and taken control of their own destiny. I wish both them and their country progress and prosperity.

On behalf of our delegation, I also have pleasure in congratulating the States that have recently joined the ILO. I trust that they will assist in developing our Organization's activities and in achieving its goals.

Our Conference is celebrating the 75th anniversary of the Organization this year and also the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. On this occasion, we cannot but pay tribute to the efforts of the ILO and its organs and commend it on the excellent results achieved over the years in pursuit of the aims set forth in the Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia.

By virtue of its unique tripartite structure, the ILO has been and remains the living social conscience that tirelessly seeks to establish international labour standards conducive to social justice and peace in the world. It firmly believes in dialogue among all parties involved in the productive process and has consistently worked for convergence of the views of the social partners so as to forge a common vision of social justice.

Our Organization should draw inspiration from this anniversary and its achievements in order to become more determined and more effective and to offer better services to its member States; it must take account of the needs of developing countries and provide them with technical assistance in the areas of employment, labour and the development of human resources in line with its objectives.

In conclusion, when our delegation speaks of the Organization's lofty ideals, in particular social justice and social peace, it cannot help drawing attention to the tragic situation of the people of Iraq; the economic embargo has claimed the lives of hundreds of thousands of women, children and old people owing to shortages of foodstuffs and medical supplies. The embargo has also had an adverse effect on development as a whole inasmuch as it has put many commercial enterprises out of business, tragically affecting the standard of living of workers and others. This is a flagrant violation of the Organization's Constitution and flies in the face of its basic aims. Faced with this tragedy, the Iraqi people, and Iraqi workers in particular, are following your proceedings in the hope that you will help to put an end to this lamentable situation and have the embargo lifted and our assets abroad unfrozen so that they may be used for humanitarian purposes, especially in view of the fact that Iraq has fulfilled all its obligations under the resolutions of the Security Council, in particular under resolution 687.

We cannot fail to mention another tragedy, that of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, whose people are also suffering the harrowing effects of an embargo. Our Organization must intervene to help those people and to put an end to their tragedy.

Mr. VODIČKA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Czech Republic) – My opening remarks shall concern themselves with congratulations to Mr. Gray for being elected President of this Conference. Let me also express my gratitude for having the opportunity of addressing this gathering of delegates from 171 countries around the globe. Yes, the ILO indeed has today, on its 75th birthday, 171 Members. I am proud of the fact that Czechoslovakia, whose successor is the Czech Republic, was among the States that established this Organization back in 1919. Dr. Edward Beneè, then the Minister of Foreign Affairs and later on the President of Czechoslovakia, did not only participate in the drafting of the ILO Constitution but also chaired the Seventh Session of the International Labour Conference in 1925, which makes him the first representative of my country who had this privilege.

The current President of the Czech Republic, Mr. Vaclav Havel, made a comment recently at the prestigious international conference in Prague regarding his conviction that the Czech Republic can no longer be characterized as a post-Communist country. In the four and a half years since the revolution which swept away the Communist regime, the people of this country have lived under a standard political system of parliamentary democracy. All system changes employed to allow for the transformation of a centrally-planned economy to a market economy have been completed. Some 60 per cent of all economic activities have been privatized and the rest will be privatized before the end of this year.

The term "privatization" does not constitute only the simple transfer of ownership rights of individuals from the State to private hands. It is a process of fundamental changes of all relations within the society. This process features a free citizen playing a dominant role while enjoying his or her rights and, equally important, the responsibilities for his or her life, family, and surroundings. The State's regulatory tendencies are being diminished. The personal responsibility of each citizen, which is being accented, the loss of so-called "social assurance" and the unavoidable yet natural differentiation of the society – all of these factors could have led to instability and social unrest. Yet they have not materialized, and I would attribute this positive phenomenon to the fact that the majority of our citizens has actually accepted the changes which have occurred in the Czech Republic.

The people trust in these changes benefiting from support in the form of political stability, a stable macroeconomic environment and a positive microeconomic outlook. This trust is being strengthened by diligent political work undertaken at many meetings of the members of Government, Parliament and representatives of political parties with citizens. An important role is being played by the tripartite negotiations which have been taking place in the Czech Republic for the fifth year in a row. These negotiations decisively contribute to the maintaining of social peace.

The regular tripartite negotiations, as well as the general agreements which are concluded every year, are not embodied in law and we do not anticipate creation of the legal framework for them in the future. We do, however, consistently implement a principle of "gentlemen's agreements". As the process of privatization progresses, the State, represented by the Government, has lost its dominant position as the sole employer. This fact will influence the future functioning of the tripartite mechanism. The main partners involved in negotiations will be the representatives of trade unions and employers. The Government will offer expert assistance to both sides and, if requested, may play the role of arbitrator to assist in reaching solutions at times of disagreement. The tripartite, or better said, bipartite negotiations remain as an irreplaceable source of self-reflection for the Czech Government, a mirror where we can see our very own performance.

I have previously mentioned Dr. Beneè in connection with this involvement in drafting the ILO Constitution. I think that the other representatives of countries present at the birth of this Organization shared his conviction that "the international coordination of economic activities of various States, the regulation of industrial competition and the internationalizing of social and economic measures will result in the elimination of possible causes of friction between nations; they brought all closer together, they worked for peace and prepared an atmosphere of friendly and intimate international collaboration."

This thought was expressed 75 years ago, immediately after the curtain fell following the catastrophic First World War. It was at times "characterized by a general loss of belief in the positive results of non-organized coordination and cooperation of individual subjects at the microeconomic level. There were many advocates of the idea of a certain worldwide regulation which, in fact, led to bureaucratic interventionism at the national level." This ill-fated policy did not prevent the world crisis nor did it harmonize relationships between nations. The world became divided for a long and lonely 50 years of this century.

Despite this experience we again and again observe attempts to find regulatory mechanisms at the international level. We hear appeals to intensify the fight against the right of the strongest which reflects itself in untidy and unlimited competition.

Today, most of us – and now I talk in terms of the Czech Republic – have a quite different viewpoint of the world as such. We have learned not only to accept and trust the free market and free trade but we have also lost our faith in ambitious political engineering and bureaucratic intervention.

We are quite aware of the fact that the problems of unemployment or the deepening of poverty among people and whole countries have been by no means solved by the demise of the divided or bipolarized world. I am convinced that no regulation can solve these problems. On the contrary, the liberalization of the world market is a step in the right direction. I have to reject each and every form of protectionism, whether it is apparent or if it is disguised under the heading of various social clauses. It is here where I sense a real danger in the possibility of implementing the right of the strongest.

Today the process of transformation does not only apply to countries which had rid themselves of totalitarian regimes. This process sooner or later will have to be undertaken by countries which we consider developed, particularly those which have adopted the principles of the welfare state in some phase of their development. I am not quite sure where the process of transformation will be more painful.

I appreciate the intent to re-evaluate the standard-setting activities of the ILO, which should reflect a general trend in the direction of deregulation. Old standards, as well as those newer ones which contain too many demands, should be fundamentally re-evaluated. Conventions should be adopted or accepted only in order to solve the most serious problems common to the majority of member States.

The ILO must implement all its authority in order to remove all the obstacles to free trade and must fight protectionism in any form. The success of the ILO does not depend on the activity of the Organization itself, but on the success of all of us, the individual Members. It will depend on the structure and functioning of our political, social and economic systems, on the degree of freedom and the degree of expansion of the market and the freedom of trade. I am convinced that when we celebrate the 150th anniversary of the ILO we will be able to proudly state that all of us have succeeded.

Mr. FORSYTH (Minister of State for Employment, United Kingdom) – I would like to begin by congratulating the President on his election: it must be counted as an exceptional honour to be chosen to preside over a Conference which marks the 75th anniversary of the ILO.

It is also an honour for me to have the opportunity to address this 75th anniversary session of the Conference on behalf of the British Government, one of the founder members of this Organization, and I very much appreciate having the opportunity to follow Minister Vodicka from the Czech Republic whose message to the Conference this afternoon is one that we would do well to heed.

Now, like many other Members of the ILO we shall be celebrating the anniversary with a number of domestic events. However, we shall also be setting up a more permanent memorial of the anniversary by establishing a new visiting fellowship for representatives of other ILO member countries to visit Britain under ILO auspices to study our labour market, or policy aspects of British employment and social affairs. I am pleased to be able to announce that in this, the first year of the fellowship, we propose to offer it to the Government of South Africa, which we welcome back to the Commonwealth as well as to the ILO.

I should like to turn now to the Director-General's Report, Defending values, promoting change. The British Government welcomes the opportunity this Report provides to reflect on the past as well as to consider the future, and I congratulate the Director-General on the broad scope of his analysis and the substantial menu of proposals he offers for change and for reform.

It is impossible in a short speech to do justice to all the items on this menu, but I should like to comment briefly on several of the Director-General's proposals for reform which my Government would strongly support; and then to highlight one or two where we see major problems, by contrast with what the United Kingdom would see as the overriding priority in this, as in all national and international fora – namely the promotion of employment and competitiveness.

The Director-General reminds us that the ILO came into existence at a time when Communism was being established. We share his view that the collapse of Communism in most parts of the world and the growing acceptance of the merits of the market economy and of the values of democracy offer the ILO an important opportunity to redefine its role. At the same time, we believe that it is important not to loose the best traditions of the Organization, which include its flexibility in recognizing the diversity of needs and interests among its Members – now totalling 171 – and its willingness to proceed on a voluntarist basis, by persuasion and by consensus.

Against this background, there are several areas in which we endorse the Director-General's call for reform, first and foremost in the field of standards. We have consistently argued that, over recent years, the Organization has produced a plethora of extremely detailed new standards which few countries, it appears, have felt able to ratify. The whole system of standard-setting risks falling into disrepute. We believe that the first essential is therefore an urgent and thorough review and rationalization of existing standards, and the second is the end to any automatic process for setting new standards. The subject and content of possible new standards should be examined in far greater depth in the future, for example through prior discussion at Conference; and we agree a wider range of more flexible approaches should be developed for many issues, leading for example to codes of practice and technical guidance which can be of immediate use in the field.

We would like to look forward to a future where the ILO has sidelined all its obsolete standards, and updated existing standards to make them more flexible and relevant to modern needs; where the ILO embarks on new standards only where there is widely agreed to be a pressing need for them; and then drafts them in clear and flexible terms which will be a help and not a hindrance to employers who are looking to create new jobs. We hope to see this vision fully endorsed in the follow-up to the Director-General's Report.

Secondly, we believe that the development since the Second World War of the ILO's capacity to offer member countries practical help through technical cooperation, particularly to support the creation of employment, should remain a key element in its future role. We support the ILO's concentrating its activity on its core mandate and areas of comparative advantage, and would hope to see further improvements to its effectiveness resulting from the active partnership of locally based ILO teams with recipient members, and from stronger efforts by the ILO to integrate its assistance with other multilateral donors such as the World Bank.

Thirdly, we support major reform of the ILO's approach to sectoral activities. The whole structure of the ILO's sectors needs to be updated and streamlined: there should be fewer, shorter and more sharply focused meetings, with more practical follow-up action in those countries requiring assistance.

But on this 75th anniversary, I do not want to dwell too long on the ILO's existing procedures when there are wider issues at stake in deciding the main focus of the ILO's future role.

We believe that the proposals for extending the supervisory activities of the ILO are wrongly focused. Frankly, the introduction of a further body along the lines of the existing Committee on Freedom of Association would not be welcome, and would, moreover, be totally at odds with the clear need to reduce the administrative workloads of the supervisory bodies and of member States. Secondly, the British Government would wish to challenge fundamentally any proposals to extend the ILO's supervisory activities, beyond its traditional mandate, into new international regulatory machinery, in the employment and social affairs field linked to international economics and trade. Quite apart from the practical problems of devising workable machinery to enforce such regulations, we believe that there is no justification for it whatsoever. On the contrary, it would put at risk new jobs on which, in so many parts of the world, higher living standards will depend.

This brings me to what I believe should be the ILO's real priority: employment, job creation. There is no doubt about the scale of the problem – in Europe alone there are now 19 million people without work, and the number is still rising; moreover, the problem in countries in transition and in developing countries is far more extensive. In Europe, and in many other parts of the world, structural problems of rigid labour markets and excessive costs have been at the heart of our poor performance, because they are the enemies of growth. Inflexible wages, high non-wage costs and needless regulations have trapped people into uneconomic jobs, or have erected barriers which have prevented employers creating new jobs quickly.

We all want to see more high-skill, high-wage, high-productivity jobs. That must be the long-term goal of all of us across the membership of this Organization. Being competitive is not a question of cutting wages. It means improving management and the skills of individuals. But that will not be enough without a commitment to removing the obstacles in the labour market which stop wealth producers from getting on with the job. In Britain, we have seen the benefits of deregulation and competition, and our record shows that a flexible labour market works. In the 1980s, we had the best record of job creation of any major country in the European Community.

The GATT accord is a triumph for the world economy, showing the way forward towards open markets and greater competition. The ILO too can play a part at the international level, by striking a balance in its approach to setting and supervising standards for people. That is the path which the Director-General should pursue in his further reform of the ILO's role and organization. The British Government stands ready to support him in that challenging task.

Mr. BRETT (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom) – I too would like to echo the congratulations of others on your election to preside over this most significant session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like, on behalf of the working people of the United Kingdom, to congratulate you on the quality of your presidential address to the opening session of this Conference. It is an inspiring and wholly fitting exposition of the concerns we need to address, and a timely reminder that this Organization was created for the protection of workers and must remain committed to that end.

The workers of Great Britain would also wish to express the shared joy of all at the downfall of apartheid in South Africa and to join in welcoming that country back into the family of the ILO.

I would like, as previous speakers have done, to address the thought-provoking Report of the Director-General Defending values, promoting change. There is much in the Report that workers in the United Kingdom can support. Indeed, through the document submitted by the Governing Body Workers' group, The ILO towards the 21st century, we have sought to make a positive contribution both to this Report and to this debate.

However, I would like to concentrate on and turn to the most controversial feature of this debate namely the virtue or otherwise of having a social clause. In relation to this aspect, I think we in the Workers' group have not been as successful as we might have hoped in getting our message across. A number of employers and governments have taken the rostrum to urge rejection of any relationship between a social clause and world trade agreements, claiming such a link represents protectionism. Most have not defined the ingredients of any social clause but have been content to condemn the concept, contents unseen. This makes me believe that they cannot have examined the workers' document, because that document spells out in detail the very limited social clause that we seek.

Perhaps therefore I can spell it out in order that no one should have any doubts about what the workers mean by a social clause. Here I can speak not only for the workers of Great Britain but for the overwhelming majority of Workers' delegates at this Conference and the people they represent. The Workers' group has held extensive consultations worldwide before submitting its document to the Director-General.

It might be helpful if I begin by saying what a social clause, in the eyes of the workers, is not about. It is not about the protection of trade, but the protection of people. It is not about establishing minimum wages across the world. It is not about transferring first-world wage levels in terms of conditions to developing countries.

It is simply about ensuring that basic human rights are respected in all countries that trade.

If I may echo the Director-General's introduction to this debate, it is about those human rights every government should respect and every country, whatever its stage of development, can afford. Our social clause is opposed to child labour. Our social clause is opposed to forced labour. Our social clause is opposed to discrimination. On the positive side our social clause supports freedom of association. Our social clause sees free collective bargaining as the means of setting the wages and conditions of employment a country can afford in the light of its domestic circumstances.

There you have it. The workers' social clause – no more, no less.

The ingredients of the workers' social clause are based on the six widely ratified ILO Conventions relating to basic human rights, Conventions Nos. 29, 87, 98, 100, 105 and 111. As the Director-General has stated, these Conventions have all been ratified by more than 100 countries. Therefore the greater part of our world has already approved the contents of our social charter.

I would hope that speakers who follow me to this rostrum could note the limited scope of the social clause we seek, and if they still oppose it even in its limited sense, then we would like them to tell us precisely why. Otherwise, those who oppose even a limited social clause of this nature do so and stand in danger of being accused of the following, not seeking to end child labour, being indifferent to forced labour, tolerating discrimination and hampering freedom of association and collective bargaining.

If any country claims that the acceptance of our social clause is so damaging to them and that it will damage their trading performance, then we, the workers, see that government operating a form of protectionism far more pernicious than anything referred to by those who fear protectionism from the developed world.

The other argument advanced against the social clause is how it could operate and what sanctions might be applied. That is clearly a subject for discussion within the new World Trade Organization. However, it is beyond any doubt that the ILO is the organization best placed to examine and police the operation of any social clause that might be introduced.

I have concentrated much of my contribution to this debate on explaining the workers' view of what constitutes an acceptable social clause. This inevitably means I cannot do justice to the remaining points of contention that I see in the Report. However, there is one point I must make, and that concerns labour standards and the concept of soft law.

Labour standards continue to be the only protection available to workers in many parts of the world, as my colleague from the Czech Republic, Richard Falbr, reminded the Conference yesterday. We fear that soft law, as defined by the Director-General, would not, as he hopes, supplement labour standards but rather supplant standard-setting. The Governing Body has already rigorously examined standard-setting items and perhaps that can be refined further. But the workers of the United Kingdom reject calls to end standard-setting, and I ask the Conference not to be beguiled by soft law concepts that will weaken our ability to raise the standards of workers across the world. That is the very purpose for which this Organization was founded.

Mr. JONES (representative of the European Communities) – I am very pleased to be with you today representing Mr. Flynn, the European Commissioner with special responsibility for social and employment policy. Mr. Flynn very much regrets he is not able to be here in person and has asked me to pass on his best wishes for the ILO's 75th anniversary, as well as his warmest congratulations, indeed those of the Commission as a whole, to Mr. Charles Gray on his election to the chairmanship of this Conference.

Mr. Hansenne's excellent Report was opportune for it goes right to the heart of the matter in discussing the future of the ILO in relation to the most crucial challenges facing us as our century comes to an end: social justice in a global economy. The success of his Report, and the references made to it in numerous quarters over the past few months, bear witness not only to its quality, but also to the importance of the subject and the need for reflection and debate in this area. And who is better placed than the ILO to launch and conduct this debate?

The ILO is 75 years old this year. Since its establishment, it has pressed for social justice throughout the world. That task is as essential now as it was 75 years ago. But we cannot ignore the fact that times have changed. Radical changes have shaken our planet, altered long-standing balances, called into question ways of thinking and, above all, completely transformed the world of work. Mr. Hansenne understood that it was also necessary to rethink the role of his Organization and on its 75th anniversary he is providing it with a magnificent opportunity to give itself a new lease on life.

We all know that social progress needs monitoring closely. We also know that, given the changes facing the world, there is danger that social justice will lose ground if we do not continue to fight for it.

The way in which we fight depends on our capacities and on the means at our disposal. The ILO carries on the fight in its fields of responsibility, and its standard-setting activities are the keystone of this work. The development of universal standards by means of Conventions negotiated within a tripartite institution is a unique approach, and we attach above all the greatest importance to the values of tripartism. Now that our economies are becoming increasingly interdependent, it is essential that we have international rules to abide by in the social field. Your Conventions are the only universal references we have.

The European Community has therefore always regarded the ILO's activities as indispensable to a balanced and just world. We have, I believe, always managed to cooperate together in a positive way, and you can rest assured that the European Commission will continue to cooperate with the ILO in the most constructive way possible.

In his Report, Mr. Hansenne has set out proposals for adapting standard-setting more closely to needs, opening up new prospects for the promotion and supervision of basic social rights and creating new synergy between international labour standards and the growth of international trade. These proposals, which aim to create a new international dynamic, are extremely interesting and we very much hope they will be taken forward. I would like today to focus briefly on the link between international labour standards and the growth of international trade.

This topic has been on many agendas in recent months and I am sure it will be discussed further in the future. It is vital to ensure that our debate takes account of all the parties' interests.

For its part, the European Commission recently affirmed the linkage between social questions and the development of international trade. This is implicit in the objectives of the European Union's foreign policy and aid and cooperation policies, which include the development and consolidation of democracy, the rule of law, the promotion of and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. We cannot fail to be concerned about exploitation and failure to respect basic social rights in certain countries with which we trade.

While rejecting out of principle any protectionist approach, the European Commission has put forward two proposals in this area.

The first concerns the future World Trade Organization. We believe that the organization, which will be called upon to play a major role as an international forum for discussions on trade matters, must tackle the subject without delay so that multilateral discussions are held on the question of respect for basic social rights – notably the right of association and the right to bargaining, forced labour and child labour – and that decisions are taken. You certainly know that following the final negotiations prior to the Marrakesh conference, these matters may now be discussed within the committee preparing for the establishment of the WTO. However, we cannot prejudge for the moment the action that is to be taken in this area in forthcoming months, nor the results that may be expected. The European Commission, for its part, will do everything it can to ensure that the question is handled dispassionately, on the basis of objective criteria.

There can be no doubt that the ILO will be called upon to play a crucial role in this area. Its Report makes clear that the ILO cannot stand apart from this debate, but nor can it associate itself with trade restrictions or compulsory levelling of social costs. I wholly endorse these views. I hope that your active participation in the process will guarantee objectivity, know-how and experience.

The second area where the European Commission has decided to take the initiative is in the Community Generalized Scheme of Preferences. Only last week the Commission adopted guidelines for the new ten-year GSP scheme. These guidelines include special incentives, one of which is the social clause.

The steps taken focus on respect for freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining, since we believe that these rights are most likely to bring about improvements in social conditions and thus help to raise living standards.

I must emphasize that this is not a punitive approach. There are no sanctions. Instead, compliance with the standards is encouraged by granting additional benefits to countries which genuinely comply. The approach is progressive so as to enable the beneficiary countries to adapt their policies gradually to the requirements of social progress. And it is based on trust, for the countries concerned will state whether their products have been manufactured in compliance with the basic rights.

What is more, the Commission proposes to back the social clauses by cooperation measures to help meet the costs of improving social standards, for example through assistance with children's schooling and the establishment of structures for social dialogue.

As you can see, therefore, the Commission's proposals are not protectionist. The social clause does not restrict trade. Rather, it aims to support social progress as a component of development. It will be for the Council of Ministers to decide what action should be taken on these proposals.

In the context of the global economy, we must make every effort to increase the opportunities we have for exchanging views, making comparisons and promoting dialogue. The World Summit for Social Development to be held in 1995 will provide such an opportunity, and I know that the ILO is taking a very active part in the preparations for this Conference.

Employment is one of the three central themes of the Summit. It is the subject mobilizing all the energies of the European Union and is at the centre of the Commission's agenda. In his opening address, Mr. Hansenne made several interesting proposals concerning employment, including the idea of preparing an annual report. I would like to conclude my remarks with a few words about the activities of the Commission in this field.

Last December, President Delors presented to the European Council a White Paper on competitiveness, growth and employment. This White Paper set out a medium-term strategy to mobilize all the social and economic actors in a common effort to tackle the problem of unemployment and to generate more jobs. I cannot overemphasize the importance of this task. There are currently 18 million people out of work within the European Union alone.

What this means is that social policies, labour market policies and economic policies have to be more effectively linked than in the past, for the simple reason that the welfare state cannot survive escalating social expenditures resulting from high rates of unemployment, social exclusion and poverty. Putting it another way, solidarity is an essential component of the growth, competitiveness and employment synergy which the Commission's White Paper on that subject established.

The White Paper, has provided a valuable stimulus to the long-term process of developing the necessary structural changes. The continuing follow-up to the White Paper will be discussed again by the European Heads of State and Government at the European Summit in Corfu later this month and at Essen in December.

Let me conclude by repeating the congratulations of the Commission on this wonderful anniversary and for all the work accomplished. We are committed to continuing to work closely with the ILO in the future.

Mr. SKELDAR (Workers' adviser, Slovenia) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would also like to refer to the interesting Report presented to the Conference by the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Michel Hansenne: Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda.

First, it is necessary to stress that the ILO's mandate to promote social justice and peace by protecting workers and promoting their rights and better working conditions be maintained. On one hand, the ILO should adapt to rapidly changing conditions to better achieve its objectives; and workers need to adapt as well. But, is the change currently taking place in the world the only possible and immutable alternative? What are the other possible and alternative changes?

The market economy is now, without any doubt, accepted throughout the world. But the question is not whether or not it should be accepted. One must ask what type of market economy should be developed. In Slovenia, we want to develop a market economy accompanied by a strong social dimension: a social-market oriented society.

The market economy will triumph only if it is much more successful in creating jobs and alleviating poverty; not in suppressing basic worker protection. The ILO must reject any trade-off between the quantity and quality of employment. To achieve a higher level of social justice, the ILO is now compelled to deal with international economic and financial policies and measures such as, for example, the insertion of the social clause into international trade rules. At the 1995 World Summit for Social Development, the ILO must reassert its influence in the United Nations system and the Bretton Woods institutions, and must play a leading role in the preparation of this meeting. The World Summit must be conducted and followed up with full tripartite involvement.

The approach adopted by Slovenia in the development of a social-market oriented society is in line with ILO orientation. In this context, we view positively the statement made by the Director-General in his Report that, in addition to making an objective analysis of the policies adopted or advocated by national and international authorities, the ILO would also propose alternative policies that need to be adopted nationally and internationally to reconcile the needs for economic growth and stability with a no less pressing need for more jobs and higher incomes for the poor. Conventions and Recommendations are of little use, if economic policies are not also considered in the light of social justice. For Slovenia and the entire Central and Eastern European region, this is an important factor in formulating and implementing strategies of transition towards a social-market oriented society. Cooperation between the ILO and the international monetary institutions at both the regional and national level is, therefore, of vital importance. It is the opinion of Slovenian trade unions that the workers' education programmes the ILO is running in the region should devote more coverage to this matter and even give it priority. This will strengthen the position of trade unions in national policy-making and especially in tripartite bodies. Tripartism is the ILO's unique strength. Workers' education programmes should devote much more emphasis to the practical organization and functioning of tripartite bodies.

In addition, it should not be taken for granted that today's technology is the best possible, especially from the human viewpoint. The question is not whether or not to accept technological change. The question is which technology to develop, which technology is more or less positive for human well-being, more or less disruptive, offering more or less opportunity for the worker to use and develop his creative potential in the work process. Different approaches exist to developing technology, and the ILO should influence technology development in such a way that it is more positive for workers and other social groups. The ILO should be involved in establishing the requirements and conditions for developing new technologies. It should be ensured that these conditions are not determined by only those forces currently behind technology development. The process of technological change is not self-propelled, and is therefore not immutable. Technology should be for the service of humanity and vice versa. It is therefore necessary to define more clearly how and to what extent workers should adapt to technology and how technology should be adapted to workers. The ILO should also adopt the concept of "working environment" instead of the concept of "safety and health at work".

It is important also that any attempt to reduce the role of Conventions and Recommendations should be resisted.

Last but not least, the problem of troubled Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Kosovo. How could the ILO help workers and trade unions there? It seems that history has not taught the world's politicians that their indecisiveness in crucial moments of history can have too high a price.

Original Arabic: Mr. BEN SEDDIK (Workers' delegate, Morocco) – We do indeed have values to defend and changes to promote. I would like to congratulate the Director-General on the topic which he has chosen for his Report to this Session of the International Labour Conference. It is indeed a very pertinent topic which could even serve as the motto of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

In its thoroughness and its serious approach the Report of the Director-General reiterates time and again the value of social justice as a principle and as an objective of the international community in general and the world of labour in particular. By so doing the Director-General raises with realism and often with legitimate concern two questions: how to give concrete expression to this value, and the role that could and should be played in this field by the International Labour Organization.

Workers can only agree with the diagnosis of the Director-General on the situation of the world and the changes it is undergoing. Indeed, we are all invited to rethink topics of such paramount importance as the globalization of the economy or the links to be established between growth and employment.

What the Director-General is calling globalization and the decline of the nation State is, I believe, the loss of the sovereignty of the State. The State, moreover, remains the only subject of international law and is called upon to govern unprecedented situations of crisis because of inequality and social exclusion, as well as such extreme phenomena as violence and war.

Whatever the statistics may indicate, and notwithstanding the hopes attached to growth in world trade, the loss of economic sovereignty has so far only produced the damages of disorderly liberalism, which responds only to supply and demand.

The result is that we are faced with an anonymous and relentless offensive against the social corrections that workers campaigned so hard to put in place in the law of the market in the course of centuries. The Director-General is right when he writes that "The liberalization of international trade and capital movements certainly offers reasonable possibilities of worldwide growth, employment creation and poverty alleviation. But there is no guarantee that greater social justice will automatically result from it. On the contrary, it will impose a heavy burden of adjustment on all countries, and on all social groups within countries, and there is a serious risk that entire nations and social groups will become increasingly marginalized as a result."

Permit me to ask a question. Is the price of what we call realism so high that henceforth we should forget the words of another Director-General of the ILO, Albert Thomas? He said back in 1931: "The social factor must take precedence over the economic factor; it must regulate and guide it in the highest cause of justice".

I would not call into question Mr. Hansenne's devotion to social justice, because I know his attachment to this cause. I share his view that it is no longer possible to solve social problems exclusively at the national level, as he says: "The factors which directly affect the attainment of the ILO's objectives are no longer entirely controlled by national authorities, and the ILO will cease to be a major force for social justice if its influence does not extend to international policies."

There are two major challenges: national policies and ILO standards on the one hand, and the place of the ILO on the international scene on the other.

Workers will never repeat enough the importance they attach to the existence and respect of ILO standards. The workers support the Director-General when he writes that "... the ILO must be careful not to be caught up in any ideology or fashion that leads to a juridical vacuum and, inevitably, to a return to the 'law of the jungle'; that would only take us back to the situation that prevailed in the early years of the Industrial Revolution, and to the unfortunate social consequences which our Organization was created to address".

But the workers can only disagree when the same work proposes on the question of topicality: "... the objective [of ILO texts] should be to provide guidance, not to create obligations".

To deal with topics of such importance and universal urgency, should the ILO not, on the contrary, draw on its constitutional tripartism to make use of the resource which consists of legislating to create law instead of simply providing guidance which will be given short shrift by those who believe in the survival of the fittest?

In the same spirit, I have some reservations as regards the proposal on "soft law". Indeed, the risks are obvious. This might give legitimacy to a "relative approach" to standards that governments, under pressure from some multinationals, would like to impose on workers. Structural adjustment programmes, the World Bank and the IMF are already largely referred to to give legitimacy to unpopular policies which freeze social protection, reduce purchasing power and break the rights of the workers in the name of competition and competitiveness on world markets.

The risk of seeing the ILO too drawn into the maelstrom of social regression as the backbone of labour standards is broken is far too high a price for us to pay.

The anniversaries that we are celebrating today are an opportunity to reaffirm the value, the topicality and I would say even the inviolability of universal labour standards, the occasion to convince ourselves that if these standards are not being ratified as largely as possible, if they are not being applied universally, that it is not because they are ill-adapted but simply because democracy and social justice are not yet universal. It is also an opportunity to proclaim that the ILO must continue to act and to improve the necessary mechanisms so that justice and democracy, which can never be fully perfected, can advance in real terms in all the regions of the world.

I come to the second challenge: the place of the ILO on the international scene. The Director-General has asked whether the Members of the ILO will wish to see its international role enhanced. "Are they ready," he asks, "to give the ILO the necessary means and authority?"

There can be doubt about the workers' reply. But one thing is clear: the ILO should assume a more important role on the international scene.

From this point of view, we cannot but regret the superficial way in which the Report referred to the question of the social clause. We were already aware of the fact – and deeply regretted – that the ILO did not involve itself more closely with this issue, because it is the ILO's standards which are supposed to be the cornerstone of this social clause. The workers were rightly entitled to expect that the Report of the Director-General would be the interpreter and the spokesman for them, or at least that it would clarify to the world the importance of the social clause.

The International Labour Conference provides an opportunity to declare, loud and clear, that the social clause has nothing to do with a world minimum wage; that on the contrary, it is the best safeguard against protectionism, based as it is on standards of law. The Conference also provides a unique occasion for the Moroccan workers to reiterate their total support for the establishment of the joint group of the ILO and the World Trade Organization. We are hoping that this project will defend the rights of workers in commercial law.

Allow me, in concluding, to say that this anniversary we are celebrating is particularly significant because it once again takes up the debate for which the ILO is known. The challenges facing the world of labour are so great, that even if we approach them systematically we will be unable to meet them in a satisfactory way. Henceforth, the ILO must take it upon itself to have its standards respected. It must establish standards to defend human rights; because they, and only they, constitute the very fabric of social justice; in other words, the social clause. And we are committed to this ideal.

The Director-General's Report has given rise to this important discussion, for which we must be grateful.

Original Spanish: Mr. EURNEKIAN (Employers' delegate, Argentina) – Speaking as a delegate to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, it is an honour for me to address this Assembly on behalf of the Argentine Employers, in order to express our views on labour matters, and to reflect upon the Director-General's Report which has been submitted to us for consideration.

I should like to begin by congratulating Mr. Charles Gray on his election as President of the Conference, an election which confers special prestige because it comes on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization.

In this case, my congratulations are not just a matter of protocol because Mr. Gray has come to this post in his role as workers' representative with a balanced view of social relations and a penchant for dialogue which is in harmony with the goals and objectives of the ILO.

The fact that this celebration and the Report of the Director-General have coincided is not a mere coincidence. Rather it is the culmination of a process of transition towards a new starting point for the ILO.

Specifically, we are discussing today not the why or the wherefore of our Organization but rather the how.

For decades the central standard-setting concern of the ILO was to enshrine individual labour rights, for example, in Conventions on working hours, the work of women and children, etc. that served as a basis for national legislation in these areas.

At the second stage, this labour-oriented vision of the ILO was supplemented with the principles of social security, and then with provisions regarding collective rights, which led to the basic Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 111, among others.

However, there was also the characteristic practice of continuing to produce Conventions whose means were more important than their ends. A standard-setting approach, if you will, which was more nominal than real. What mattered was the existence rather than the implementation of standards. What was important was for the Conference to vote in new Conventions, without taking account of the number of countries that were in the position to ratify.

Curiously, therefore, the ILO entered a process which led to less value being attached to standards, with facts being more important than established rules because no account was taken of whether the countries were willing to ratify or whether they could effectively apply the standards.

This divergence between standards and reality meant that in many cases, the standards were mere academic products studied by labour experts and office officials whereas in reality there was a kind of legal vacuum.

One therefore could usefully imagine the table of ratifications and would see this irrefutable conclusion: more standards and fewer countries ratifying them.

Furthermore, even among those that ratify, a trend can be seen: to ratify and not to implement.

A careful assessment, even a provisional one in this area, would simply corroborate the fact that we have come to the end of a cycle and as the Director-General has suggested to us, we are facing a real need to consider the future of the ILO, not its objectives and goals, but the way of dealing with its agenda.

We are facing new situations in a new world.

The dissemination of political democracy even in countries which are traditionally authoritarian, the replacement of the concept of the total State by the recognition of the primacy of an effective State, the forging of private initiative and its role in modern society, globalization of markets, political, economic and social integration – these indeed are the new realities.

But there are other new realities which are the inequalities mentioned by the Director-General in his Report such as the impact of technical progress and its consequences; a world with 43 million unemployed. No one is in doubt that we are in, and are moving towards, a different world. The main question is whether we are adequately promoting the development of social justice.

Now the first thought that occurs to us is that there is no social progress without economic development.

Latin America, and in particular Argentina, lived for a long period of time with this fiction. The economic errors committed in the name of social justice led in fact to greater injustice, poverty and marginalization.

Argentina consolidated a new historical cycle of political democracy some 11 years ago after decades of going backwards and forwards. It turned resolutely towards a market economy and unrivalled privatization given its breadth and depth, as well as to a major reorganization of the State structure. It is now undergoing changes to its productive system and it certainly needs to integrate into its productive system those areas which are less competitive, in particular, small and medium-sized enterprises and to integrate into society in general those parts of the country which are the poorest and most underdeveloped.

Based on this experience, and having made the decision to grow, both in production and in genuine employment, Argentine employers are aware of their responsibilities and of what they wish to achieve. This long road that we have begun clearly requires the improvement of instruments that, to the achievements of economic stability, will also add growth and investment, because without these there can be no social progress.

Globalization requires the system of production to become competitive, and this cannot be accomplished without the necessary redeployment and new marketing and production structures. This challenge is based on the assumption that there can be no turning back by the Government from the commitment and the direction adopted. I should like to stress that in our case both the people and the Government have come together in order to bring about these changes, and they will continue to persevere until they have reached a level where efficiency and productivity can be achieved, thus improving the living standards of our workers.

I should also like to welcome the joining of wills and cooperation that this process of change represents.

The Argentine trade union movement has understood the transforming nature of privatization and the imperative need to reorganize the State.

In the same spirit with which we praise them, we would also like to appeal to the Argentine trade unions here and now to accept the obvious need to bring flexibility to our labour system, as well as to move forward in redefining the controversial occupational accidents system, because it is unjust, disproportionate and highly contentious, and also to recognize the need to deregulate public works and reduce the continuing high labour charges.

All of us in Argentina are aware that the labour institutions of the 1950s, and even of the 1970s, did not consider the reciprocal needs of workers and employers. They made labour costs higher, and in the end they became a disincentive to higher levels of employment.

Finally, but this is not any less important, there is an irrefutable truth that excessive labour regulation has led to the growth of the informal sector, which is free of any regulation, and which exerts unfair competition on the formal sectors of the economy.

This economic and, consequently social dualism, is a discriminating factor among workers and acts to the detriment of those who are kept out of any type of work. Thus this gap between legal guarantees and marginal labour also undermines adequate economic and social order.

Over-regulation, whether national or international, designed to set in store acquired rights, when change is taking place all around, ends up by being counterproductive for the workers' own objectives which should be to create productive jobs. In the emerging countries, this adds up to technological inferiority and substandard productivity and worker training – the complex of achievement in the industrialized countries. This means that, in a globalized economic system, the situation that can only benefit the developed countries to the disadvantage of other countries' production and employment.

We propose that a compromise between labour and labour standards is needed that is acceptable both for our country and the ILO.

We are convinced that the ILO's value can be reaffirmed only in an economic and political framework, which will bring together economic and political freedom and increased investment, the only prerequisites of sustained social development.

There is no doubt that our representative nature as employers, and the function we carry out requires from us another vision: neither ignore nor deny change; rather direct them so that the ongoing structural changes are at the same time an effective vehicle for social progress.

The Director-General has asked whether it is necessary to retain the current rate of issue of international labour standards as well as national legislation: our reply is that standards can influence conduct or bring about the same result. But many of the ILO's standards are not really standards at all in this sense i.e., by the substance of their content.

David Morse, a former Director-General of the ILO, said that in the early years the goal of the ILO was to hold back what it considered to be the adverse effects of international economic competition on working people. He also said that some countries were being prevented from obtaining unfair advantages in international trade as a result of substandard labour practices and laws. This is certainly not the case today.

This ideal was implemented with success and failure. Today with 75 years of experience behind us when we are asked to discuss the standard-setting role of the ILO, we can ignore the fact that the failures have been the result of a complex system of provisions, and low ratification and application rates by some countries, and the difficulties of the supervisory machinery in controlling this.

On the other hand, we have to re-assess what is the hard core, the true essence of the Organization's work. We believe that a discussion on the social clause would revitalize the role of the ILO and would not make people turn to other international organizations.

While the globalization of the economy is bringing about fundamental change of a structural nature, this type of social dumping not only violates the ideals and beliefs of the ILO, but also generates distortion in international trade, affects labour costs and distorts international trade more than ever, given the globalization of the economy where interests prevail over principles.

Therefore, we cannot ignore the fact that some countries are systematically failing to implement the fundamental principles of the ILO so as to compete unfairly, both economically and in social areas.

With respect to the discussion of the social clause in multilateral agreements, we would like to see debate on this topic in the ILO because this is the correct forum for this. It has been since 1919 and it will continue to be so.

Finally, this anniversary which we are celebrating today calls us to reflect, assess our esteemed past, our very difficult present, and a future which will depend on our analysis, on the proposals that we will agree upon and consolidate the firmness of our decisions and the conviction that the revitalized and remoulded standards of the ILO will be the cornerstone for a more just society.

Our greatest hope is that future years will reflect the achievement of this compromise.

Original French: Mr. MEKIDECHE (Employers' delegate, Algeria) – I am honoured to have the privilege, on this 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, of addressing the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like first to congratulate Mr. Charles Gray, Director of the International Affairs Department of the AFL-CIO, on his brilliant election as President of our session. His election is all the more noteworthy as it corresponds with the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia and that it consolidates tripartism.

I also wish to associate myself with the tributes paid to Mr. Jean Pascal Delamuraz, Federal Counsellor of the Swiss Confederation, for participating personally in the commemorative ceremony of the 75th anniversary of our Organization.

The delegation of Algerian employers welcomes the presence here of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali.

I greatly appreciated the Report of Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General, on questions of social justice in a global economy: questions which are central to our concerns, i.e. those of Algerian employers. Before making a number of comments on this Report, I would like, if I may, to describe a number of characteristics of the economic environment which are determining the development and treatment of social problems in our country.

Our Conference, as we all know, is taking place this year once again in a context of accelerated international change, but also of crises which are affecting most countries. The world situation, characterized by the globalization of economies, requires painful but inevitable economic restructuring, and this is true both for industrialized and for developing countries. All this is taking place against a background of ever-fiercer international competition.

The President, as a leader of one of the biggest trade union organizations in the world, is well placed to understand the constraints weighing on the economies of the developing countries and their social consequences. Algeria, for its part, like many countries, is firmly committed to a process of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy. As you know, Algeria set about rescheduling its debt at a time when its export earnings could not longer cover its repayments.

It has recently signed the so-called "stand-by" agreement with the IMF and has just undertaken a rescheduling of its debt with the Club of Paris.

As entrepreneurs we too experience the rigour of these adjustments. The recent large devaluation of our currency has made more expensive capital goods and imported intermediate consumer goods. This increased cost cannot entirely be passed on to consumer prices because household incomes have also, at the same time, declined.

As concerns social constraints, these are even more complex and difficult to manage in Algeria because we have, as the Director-General said in his Report last year, a social system which is based on the European model.

Furthermore, this process of adjustment produces unprecedented social problems on a large scale which call for the establishment of social safety nets, both as concerns the social consequences of overmanning in enterprises, and in order to protect the purchasing power of low income wage earners – given inflation levels which have stabilized but are still running at 30 per cent.

The recent setting up of the National Economic and Social Council constitutes a new stage in tripartite social dialogue, particularly auspicious in this delicate period of transition.

We stress again that we, Algerian employers, would like to receive technical assistance from the ILO, not only to help us confront the negative social consequences of industrial restructuring, but also, more generally, to share with us its wealth of experience in its areas of expertise.

Continuing its integrated approach to reform, Algeria has just joined GATT, thereby joining the world-wide movement of liberalization of international trade in goods and services.

In this same context of trade, cooperation and codevelopment, we believe that the relocation of industry and services to our countries that have comparative advantages should not be regarded as negative for the developed countries; it should rather be seen as a new opportunity for the redeployment of the international economy, of which Algeria is part.

We, Algerian employers, support these initiatives because we believe in the synergistic effects of partnership. Incentives are being provided in the shape of the new investment code and the provisions of the Finance Act, which in particular enshrine the freedom of investment and guarantee the movements of capital. Public enterprises, already autonomous, are committed to a process of restructuring, including the opening of their capital to Algerian and foreign private partners in a manner generally beneficial to all the partners concerned.

In these circumstances what comment can I make on the Report of the Director-General? Not only do I subscribe in general to the Director-General's analysis, but I also support the values he proposes we should defend, and the changes we should undertake. We also reaffirm our support for social justice as a central value, our confidence in tripartism and our will to see our Organization adjust to the tasks ahead, and the challenges facing it.

In conclusion, I simply want to highlight the organic links that exist between economic transformations in our countries and the magnitude of the scale of the resulting social problems. The success of our adjustment process is closely bound up with the effectiveness of the social accompaniment programmes drawn up in a tripartite framework. Economic effectiveness and social justice are indivisible.

I am sure that we all share the determination to give expression to these principles, because without economic efficiency there can be no social justice.

I cannot conclude without congratulating South Africa on rejoining the ILO, and to look forward to the development of good relations with the employers of that country.

FOURTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda this morning is the report of the Selection Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 3C. It contains further changes in the composition of Conference committees, following those indicated in Provisional Record Nos. 3A and 3B. If there are no objections, may I take it that this report is adopted?

(The report is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – We will now continue with the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original French: Mr. DIOP (Minister of Employment, Labour and Vocational Training, Senegal) – It is indeed an honour and a great pleasure for me, on behalf of the delegation of Senegal and on my own behalf, to extend to the President our warmest congratulations on the occasion of his election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

We have no doubt whatsoever that the tremendous qualities and considerable experience which prompted this election, and also that of the other Officers, will enable us to achieve positive results and respond to the expectations that this session, coinciding as it does with the 75 years of existence of our Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, has raised.

The Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, stated from this very rostrum that the world today is seeking a new social covenant, and that the ILO was invited to play a foremost role in conceiving and implementing this covenant.

My delegation is convinced that our Organization, after 75 years of existence and thanks to its experience and know-how, is an indispensable tool for the international community in its quest to find a new social order. Indeed, no institution is better equipped than the ILO to help to meet the challenges facing mankind on the eve of the twenty-first century.

After the profound changes of the last few years, the Organization is now at a crossroads and must meet the new challenge that history has dealt to it, as the Director-General stated in the frank assessment contained in the Report he submitted for our reflection.

We can never say enough how much our countries need the assistance of the ILO at this time. For despite the fact that the evolution of international society has highlighted the global dimension of the problems to be solved, we believe that the specific solutions to these problems must give particular emphasis to the specific nature of certain situations in certain parts of the world.

Similarly, we note today that there is a globalization of trade, which places economies with unequal potentials in competition with one another. This could further widen the gap between rich and poor countries. Therefore, a genuine consultation between the various partners is needed, particularly with respect to the implementation of the agreements passed within GATT.

As concerns Africa, my delegation is of the opinion that due thought should be given to the structural adjustment policies which have been imposed on our countries. Although they are necessary, they have revealed some real shortcomings, and we must learn from these shortcomings.

There are other areas requiring attention, and namely the debt burden, the negative transfer of financial resources and the considerable drop in public and private foreign investment. This situation, which has been further aggravated by the recent devaluation of the CFA franc in certain African countries, demonstrates how important and urgent it indeed is to make these countries more capable of participating in the global effort to achieve economic and social development.

Finally, our Organization cannot help but emphasize the importance of the social clause. The stakes of the social clause should prompt us to seek concertation actively, with a view to achieving a solution taking account of the interests of all involved.

My delegation is deeply convinced that development is both the responsibility of States and the right of peoples. That is why, on the basis of the standard-setting work of our Organization, considerable efforts have been made in Senegal to provide for social modernization in several fields.

For example, the labour administration has recently been reoriented towards its original mission. The social security institutions, which are still considered as public services, have nevertheless been privatized with a view to protecting them from the vicissitudes of state intervention. The system of social protection is now being supplemented with the establishment of a national health insurance fund, for which we have requested the support of the Office.

As for child labour, Senegal has already hosted several international multidisciplinary seminars on this subject, which is one of our major concerns.

I should like to conclude my address by expressing our thanks to the Office for the support it has afforded Senegal. We are a country which, like others, is facing the harsh realities imposed upon us by the deregulation of the world economic system. Despite these difficulties, our country is carrying out its objective of economic and social development under the guidance of our Head of State, President Abdou Diouf.

On the eve of the twenty-first century, Senegal would like to join in the ILO's call to reject the philosophy of despair. We intend to remain an active and productive partner with the ILO as we together face the future, which we consider to be a major challenge.

(Mr. Mendoza takes the Chair.)

Original Portuguese: Mr. PIRES TINY (Minister of Justice, Labour and Public Administration, Sao Tome and Principe) – Participating in this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference under the aegis of the 75th anniversary of the ILO is for me a great honour and a pleasure at a time when all of us, representatives of governments, workers, and employers, have come together to reflect upon what we are and what this Organization should be.

Before I go on, may I offer my congratulations to the President on my own behalf and on behalf of my Government, on his election to manage the business of this session. The way in which he has gone about his work demonstrates how fit was this election, therefore our warmest congratulations.

My tribute also to the Director-General, Michel Hansenne, for the excellent and timely Report which he has presented to us, which is one of the essential bases for our reflections and discussions.

At this time of the 75th anniversary of this international Organization, the essence of which is to deal with social matters, especially as concerns standards and labour relations; at a time in which the world is characterized by profound and irreversible transformations of a geopolitical nature, both inside and outside national boundaries, at a time in which multiparty democracy is moving forward slowly but surely, and when economies are opening up, becoming more democratic and more globalized, leaving behind the former limited boundaries of each State, requiring them and especially the less developed ones to exert great efforts to adapt and reinforce their domestic capacities; at a time in which poor countries, like Sao Tome and Principe, which have decidedly opted for democracy and for economic reforms of their systems as they seek the institutional, scientific and financial resources absolutely necessary for the consolidation of those conquests which they have made in order to guarantee basic human rights:

This is a time when it is absolutely necessary to take stock of the situation and question ourselves about the final objectives of the ILO, about the role which it has been playing since it was first set up, and about what it could and should become in the future. It is therefore necessary to understand what should be maintained, what should be changed, what adaptations should be made, and what adaptations and resources are necessary.

Consequently, we would like to express here our full agreement with the subjects proposed for discussion under the eloquent title Defending values, promoting change.

Now is the moment when we must move steadfastly toward the future, in terms of what our objectives and strategies are, as well as of centralized and decentralized structures, and in regard to the ways and means of acting.

I would like to mention that my country, which is on the list of the least developed countries, or LDCs, three years ago held free, democratic, peaceful elections and is fully committed to a process of democratization, of consolidating and restructuring its society, its institutions, its economy, and the mentalities of the people as part of a structural adjustment programme. There is, however, an even greater problem. And if we do not find a satisfactory solution to it, we shall jeopardize these hard-won liberties, hard won by the people of Sao Tome and Principe, endangering our democracy. This problem is our greatest social issue.

I think it is easy enough to understand a small country without extensive financial resources and with a structurally unbalanced economy where 90 per cent of production and exportation is based on a single product, cacao, as well as having a massive external debt. For all these reasons, it is going through a structural adjustment programme which is excessively austere and which overall has not achieved short-term satisfactory results but instead has had very harmful social effects in the short run. It is therefore easy to understand that such ingredients in a democratic framework with widespread political and social freedoms provide a context in which we can indeed talk about social issues.

The Government, with the pressing need to undertake macroeconomic reforms, has been constantly seeking the best ways and means of responding to this problem. The situation is characterized by a high poverty rate, particularly in rural areas, falling real wages, a high unemployment rate, a low level of private foreign investment, and in general a weak business and production sector. The new democratic institutions, particularly the Government, for three years has been slowly but surely dismantling and reorganizing an economy which had been completely state run.

Even if there were no justification for our option, we would still reaffirm the good sense of having opted for a social approach. We trust that the ILO will provide us with the support we are lacking in terms of internal reflection, because, in view of the major gaps in the United Nations system when dealing with this area, we believe the ILO – based on its constitutional principles and its experience – is the best equipped to eliminate these gaps. The prime importance of the social question, therefore, must be reaffirmed and a definition of a strategy for combatting unemployment is a priority. The 1995 Social Summit will thus be the best possible opportunity to embody this principle.

For the objectives which I have mentioned to be achieved with the proper efficiency and effectiveness we consider it to be indispensable that the ILO's intervention machinery should be continually improved so that it will become more operational, effective and efficient. It is desirable that the time elapsing between a request for support and the resultant action should be drastically reduced. I understand that certain measures have already been adopted along these lines.

I would like to make now a short comment upon the ratification and implementation of the standards to say that if I take as my basis the experience of my own country, probably applicable to many developing countries with certain exceptions, this question is a "case" only in appearance. What I mean by this is that it should be a matter of special concern of all member States of this Organization to see that those standards are applied, particularly those which on a realistic basis contribute to protecting and guaranteeing fundamental rights of workers. Also deserving of even greater attention by the ILO is a study of the factors and causes which prevent the application of standards.

I would like to just touch upon some of these causal factors. First of all, a formal lack of knowledge of specific Conventions and the procedures applicable to them. Normally speaking this involves the lack of competent staff with whom we can hold regular discussions in our countries. Secondly, once ratified the application of these Conventions is not properly monitored and supervised. Thirdly, the reduced role of the ILO in the promotion of such standards as regards national authorities and the people, and the lack of proper support from our governments. I believe that greater dynamism along these lines would give us better results. Finally, when it is not a question of non-application of a standard, there is a relevant factor when an evaluation is made: in many member States real progress has been noted in the application of standards on the basis of domestic regulations without the Conventions having been ratified. As an illustration, there have been cases of countries which have ratified a very small number of Conventions but which in their domestic legislation do in fact apply the content of many of them.

It seems to us that some effort of adaptation should be made by involving all parties in question: the ILO, governments, union organizations and employers' associations could come together, facilitated to the extent that our countries in principle make tripartism an active presence.

As far as we are concerned in our country, taking into account the specific characteristics of our economy and the fact that political dialogue on the basis of pluralistic democracy preceded socially structured dialogue, we are now taking the first steps towards this process: informing our social partners and training them as regards tripartism, collective bargaining and social concertation. We shall continue along this path in the certainty that, acting in good faith and combining our efforts, we will do even more for our people.

Mr. THANESUEN (Employers' delegate, Thailand) – As the representative of the Employers' Confederation of Thailand (ECOT), I wish to congratulate the International Labour Organization on the occasion of its 75th anniversary this year, as well as of the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The International Labour Organization plays an important role in the social and economic development of the member States, especially in the developing economies such as Thailand. It is really a great pleasure for the Employers' Confederation of Thailand to have the opportunity to work with the International Labour Organization in this regard in our country.

The Employers' Confederation of Thailand realizes that much remains to be done in the area of social and economic welfare development in Thailand, which is becoming increasingly complex. This may be attributed to the changes in our own internal economic and social structure, as well as from the external forces generated by today's world of technology and information, also known as "globalization".

A problem for our economy is that our labour skills sometimes fail to match the requirements of the modern world industries. Part of our labour force is made up of unskilled labour, which is not easy to mobilize or bring in line with the constantly changing new technologies. The Government has introduced certain measures to upgrade the quantity and quality of labour through formal and compulsory education, but this is still not quite sufficient.

Vocational training, therefore, is much needed. An effort has been made by the Government, labour and employers to set up training centres for the active labour force does exist, but this has been minimal. Since government budgets for both higher and formal education and training centres are relatively limited, I truly believe that greater efforts must come from the employers and employees.

This will be one of our major tasks in the years to come and we hope the International Labour Organization will lend us some assistance on this matter.

During the first few years of this decade, tripartism in Thailand was not very successful because the whole country was then under pressure as the Government was not fully democratic. Instead of nominating the actual employers' representative for some functional committee, outsiders were chosen from irrelevant organizations which were not registered under the labour relations law. Hence it is obvious that under the present democratic government led by a Prime Minister elected by the people, Thailand's labour relations and development will be more successful than previously – especially after the establishment of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare this year. This step is a clear sign that the Government is really attempting to alleviate the employment problems of the people. Moreover, we are extremely fortunate that the present Minister of Labour is familiar with this area and is very knowledgeable and interested in this topic. Therefore, thanks to our concerted efforts, we are fast approaching the realization of tripartism in Thailand.

Original Spanish: Mr. LINARES CALVO (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Cuba) – The belief in social justice as one of the fundamental values and the commitment to promote it appear in the Report of the Director-General before us, a Report which also introduces elements of renewal in the programme and activities of the ILO.

Regardless of the different ways in which the internationally much invoked concept of social justice is presented and perceived, this reassertion of its values affords scope and a field of action to States and to those of us who continue to believe in the universal validity of that ideal.

The approach taken with regard to the changes occurring in the modern world, that take as their symbol the fall of the Berlin Wall, marks the end of the bipolar world. This is a fact of our times, but in asserting that the South is no longer the antithesis of the North one avoids another facet of harsh reality which tells us that after the disappearance of the East-West conflict, there is an increasing divide between North and South.

In the emerging new international order being devised by the great powers, neither political nor economic formulas are being devised which take into account the problems of the South. The global overhaul under way is driving the nations of the South to reintegrate themselves into the world economy and the system of international relations in ways which compound their dependency on and subordination to the main centres of power.

The imposition of the neo-liberal model and reintegration subordinated to transnational capital are engendering in most developing countries an extreme exacerbation of the domestic socio-economic crisis which generates intolerable pressures when the centres of political and financial power are those which determine, or impose, the economic policy of developing countries. There is no leeway for the people organized through democratic institutions to take fundamental decisions in their own country.

This outlook should not lead us to defeatism. There is perforce a need to seek out alternative solutions in line with this harsh reality. The major challenge is identifying points of contact in the struggle for development through social justice, while not losing sight of these goals as a result of sectarian or discriminatory misgivings.

As the Report of the Director-General states the objective of the ILO "is not to promote the universal application of a single model but rather, taking the diversity of situations as our starting-point, to discern what can logically and reasonably claim to be universal".

As for the contentious issue of the social clause which appears in the Director-General's Report, I feel that this is something which we must study carefully, once we have become familiar with its true objectives and scope, and in any event it could not be accepted as a new form of protectionism or discrimination used to impose upon the poor countries unfavourable conditions in their international trading relations.

In my country the triumph of the revolution and the path of socialism have made it possible to eradicate illiteracy, to bring about widespread access to a system of free education which has made it possible to create a highly-skilled workforce, to guarantee full employment and social security to protect all workers, to establish a totally free health service for the whole population which, notwithstanding our present difficulties, made it possible to reduce in 1993 the child mortality rate to 9.4 per thousand live births. It has also been possible for us to establish the basis for economic, scientific and technical development through the creation of a production-oriented infrastructure.

The abrupt disappearance of the market with which we sustained more than 80 per cent of our commercial and economic relations, allied with the stiffening of the United States economic blockade, have gravely affected the living conditions of the population.

We can truly say that while these effects are not tragic, it is largely because of the ability of the revolutionary state to remain faithful to the principles of equity and social justice, and is also thanks to the degree of awareness and participation of our people in the quest for solutions which make it possible for us to adjust to new and totally different international economic realities, and adapt our economic model and policy without forgoing the essential socialist values in these new circumstances.

It is not simply a case of achieving economic recovery, it is rather a process of establishing a qualitatively different economy in line with international circumstances. A model is emerging in which, by maintaining the leading role of the State, it is nonetheless possible to develop in an organized fashion a sector of self-employed workers and to expand the cooperative agricultural sector.

In the state sector of the economy different characteristics are emerging, such as association with foreign capital, the decentralization of foreign trade, the expansion of financial and operational autonomy of enterprises, the struggle for profitability, the streamlining of the state apparatus, energy-savings policy and others.

This array of economic reforms is being carried out with the resolve to maintain the level of rights already attained by workers. It is not a question of applying shock policies which will affect the vulnerable strata of society. The idea is to find solutions to common problems which are facing the whole of society without minority privileges, and therefore the component of public opinion and understanding of workers is crucial in this process.

Cuba, a founding member of the ILO, has been marked throughout the last 35 years by its support and respect for the noble task carried out by this Organization for the benefit of the workers of the entire world, and which in the present circumstances of international change is being reasserted by the Director-General in his Report to this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, in which he declares his faith in social justice.

This faith in social justice is what has made it possible in very adverse economic conditions for us to struggle to maintain the political and social gains achieved by our people, who continue to exercise their workers' rights enshrined in our laws, which are sustained and implemented by means of the 86 ILO Conventions ratified by our country, which places us amongst the top eight States for the total number of ratifications.

All of us who have taken on responsibilities in the sphere of work and social policy know the complexities this involves for a small, poor and economically open country in tackling the challenge of development with social justice. But if the pernicious effects derived from the current unjust international economic order are compounded by factors of political conditioning, and the ability to impose positions of force alien to the characteristics, history, free determination and sovereignty of our peoples, the task becomes all the more titanic.

My country is facing this situation. For more than 30 years we have been the subject of a cast-iron embargo which is affecting all aspects of our economic and social life, an inhuman act which imposes extraordinary sacrifices on our people, especially our children, old people and the sick. There are studies which show that we have suffered losses of over $41 billion as a result of the embargo. This is not only a means of suspending trade, it is a series of economic, commercial, financial, political, propagandistic and other actions against Cuba. The embargo is intended to bring the people to its knees through hunger and sickness. Its effects in the social and labour field are considerable and directly affect the enjoyment of the acquired rights of our workers.

The international community has taken a definitive stand that this illegal, unjust and inhuman measure should be ended through the adoption, by a considerable majority during the 48th Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations, of resolution 48/16 entitled the "Necessity of ending the economic, commercial and financial embargo imposed by the United States of American against Cuba".

Lastly, we would like to congratulate South Africa on the victory achieved by her people.

Original French: Mr. OUEDRAOGO (Minister of Employment, Labour and Social Security, Burkina Faso) – On behalf of the delegation of Burkina Faso I would like to greet all delegations, members of the Governing Body, the Director-General of the ILO and his colleagues and all those participating in the work of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would like to offer my warmest congratulations to the President on his election and all his Vice-Presidents. I wish them success in the discharge of their responsibilities.

The holding of this present session of the Conference coincides with the 75th anniversary of our Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

This session is therefore taking place in a particularly difficult economic and social context for the whole world, particularly for the developing countries. In this context, we express our support for the Director-General's philosophy and we congratulate him on his option to celebrate these major anniversaries against a background of forward- thinking upon the future of this Organization.

The Director-General's Report calls upon us to examine new approaches for the Organization in the light of the many challenges it has to deal with as we move to the third millennium.

This Report provides information on the great political and economic changes which have taken place in the world – changes which require a redefinition of the methods of action of this Organization. The importance of the subject therefore means that we must share our points of view upon these major questions.

For us, the globalization of the economy raises hopes but at the same time gives great cause for concern in the poorer countries.

The globalization of the economy has led to considerable progress being made over the last few years, particularly through the development of trade in goods and services, financial capital flows, foreign investment, the interconnection of financial markets, but Africa stands outside this progress. The burden of its foreign debt is getting heavier all the time, which prevents us from benefiting from any form of world financial integration. Africa therefore stands outside international economic competition.

Economic reforms implemented with the support of partners for development have not yet had the positive effects we had hoped for.

Africa therefore remains the continent with the greatest number of the poorest of the poor. Natural disasters, inclement weather and social and political conflicts have created very precarious social and food supply situations, and have forced millions of people to move.

In the African members of the franc area, the recent devaluation of the CFA franc, with all its consequences on the standards of living and the working conditions of the African populations, is a social, political and economic fact of major importance for us at the end of this century.

The sudden fall in the purchasing power of the populations makes the risk of social conflicts worse every day, which in time could compromise the success of the reforms already implemented.

The present economic environment of Africa, although it does have isolated areas of growth here and there, looks particularly difficult as a whole, as millions of workers see their conditions of work and standards of living dangerously jeopardized in this context.

Burkina Faso, in spite of its harsh natural environment, has emerged somewhat from the prevailing pessimism of the continent, and become something of an island of tranquillity because of the implementation of democratic institutions which respect individual and collective freedoms, social and economic rights, and has also moved towards a more rigorous management of its public affairs. Nevertheless, this has been upon a basis of great sacrifices by different sectors of the population, particularly the wage-earners.

The Government has made tripartite dialogue its strategy for solving social conflicts.

Burkina Faso is convinced that the solution to both the social and economic problems facing humanity can only be found through the international community acting in the framework of collective and concerted action.

Therefore, our country thinks that we would not be going too far if we were to appeal to the industrialized countries, calling on them to become more aware of their role in seeking for overall solutions at the world level.

This involves finding a solution to the debt problem, taking account of the human and social dimension in economic reform programmes, restoring the terms of trade by raising the price of raw materials from countries in the south.

We are convinced that our Organization can and must introduce activities in this area and this session is one of the best places to reflect on the most appropriate solutions.

I cannot finish my speech without, like preceding speakers, paying tribute to the heroic people of South Africa whose determination has finally ended the system of apartheid.

The recent free and democratic elections which have led to a resounding victory by the African National Congress is an illustration of what I have just said.

I should also pay tribute to our Organization, the ILO, which together with the peoples of South Africa has struggled towards this aim through its Committee on Action against Apartheid.

We hope that our discussions which will undoubtedly reflect democratic values will bring forth useful conclusions for the well-being of workers throughout the world.

I wish us all every success.

Mr. BHUIYAN (Minister of Labour and Manpower, Bangladesh) – It is my pleasure and privilege to extend my sincere and warm congratulations to the President on his election at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. As we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO, it is only fitting that a President, representing the workers, should chair the 81st International Labour Conference. I am confident that his long experience, wisdom and dynamic leadership would help conduct the proceedings of the Conference smoothly. I also extend my felicitations to the distinguished Vice-Presidents elected along with him.

It gives me immense pleasure to congratulate the Republic of South Africa on its return to the ILO following the successful elections on a non-racial basis. I also welcome Oman, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan as new Members of the ILO.

I take this opportunity to pay my sincere compliments to the Director-General for his thought-provoking Report entitled Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda. The secretariat also deserves my thanks and appreciation for the excellent job it has accomplished in producing the documents on the agenda items.

We appreciate very much the Director-General's reaffirmation, on the occasion of the ILO's 75th anniversary, of the principles of social justice and his determination to further this cause. The reality of a changing world, globalization of the economy and proliferation of social problems are intimately linked to values that permeate all aspects of society. It would be dangerous to either ignore or overestimate the challenges which confront us at this time or their impacts on the standard-setting work of the ILO. An objective analysis of the world labour situation is thus an imperative necessity. And this is the undertaking the International Labour Organization should embark upon with the renewed assurances from the international community.

It is often argued that economic development depends on free trade and, while there has been criticism about the effectiveness of ILO standards as regulators of international trade, we must take cognizance that unbridled liberalization of trade can work against the social objectives of the ILO. The protection and promotion of basic social rights, while ensuring growth of trade, presupposes the necessity of improving the conditions of life as well as creation of new employment opportunities. The living and working conditions in developing countries will improve only if economic well-being of those countries is improved through appropriate domestic policies and adequate external support. We, therefore, believe that the linking of new labour standards with trade will not serve any useful purpose. Let us remind ourselves that the ILO does not have a mandate to regulate international trade. In view of this, it is essential to consider very carefully if the ILO should play an active role in the field of global trade, with the apparent objective of standard setting. We reiterate our view that cooperation, not coercion, should guide the ILO's efforts to promote social progress. In this context, the Director-General's suggestion for a kind of a "secular arm" outside the ILO also deserves to be thoroughly examined.

The ILO's role as an organization at the service of its constituents has assumed greater dimensions, particularly as a partner in technical cooperation. This should remain a major means of action for the ILO, to be implemented on the basis of needs and priorities of its constituents. Obviously, the developing and, in particular, the least developed countries should appear on the priority list. The concept of active partnership is most welcome. But the objectives are to be determined keeping in view the real socio-economic conditions prevailing in each country. The ILO, with the tripartite structure of its machinery for developing and supervising all application of standards, the principles and values for which it stands, together with its long experience, should continue to play its privileged role in strengthening the national capacities of the developing countries, particularly the least developed ones, in the field of its competence and help them attain the goal of self-reliance.

We, in Bangladesh, have celebrated the great occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO with our utmost sincerity. A colourful rally, publication of a special supplement in the national dailies, tripartite discussion sessions, cultural functions, special radio and television programmes, etc., marked the occasion. In this context, I must humbly acknowledge the active participation from the employers' and workers' organizations in celebrating this occasion. Since its inception, the ILO's educational and technical programmes for the cause of social justice, better living and working conditions and the promotion of full employment have created among the toiling people a sense of self-reliance, hope and inspiration. I earnestly wish that the ILO would grow stronger with new areas of programmes and technical assistance for pursuing social justice and economic and material well-being for the working masses.

Since 1973, the ILO's technical cooperation programmes have been in operation in Bangladesh. These programmes are aimed at responding to the needs of the constituents: government, employers and workers, in the core mandate of the Organization, conceived and executed in line with the ILO's active partnership policy.

The undercurrent of the changes to a market economy and its associated challenges are also being felt in Bangladesh. This calls for meaningful technical cooperation and assistance in order to alleviate poverty and generate employment opportunities. Against this backdrop, it is all the more necessary to re-examine a number of ideas and suggestions that have been put forward in the Director-General's Report with the ultimate objective of promoting social justice. In this context, we take note of the ILO's policies and programmes undertaken on the basis of its active partnership policies in order to bring closer its tripartite constituents and to enhance the coherence and quality of technical cooperation. We are hopeful that the ILO's newly established multidisciplinary teams in various regions of the world would play a major role in the field of the ILO's technical services.

Before I conclude, I would like to briefly touch upon some of the agenda items on this Conference.

With the introduction of majority rule in South Africa, the review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid may be treated appropriately as befits such a momentous and historic change.

The agenda item on "Safety and health in mines" has drawn my Government's attention. Bangladesh is not in favour of adopting a new instrument in view of the existing ILO instrument on the subject. However, if any such instrument is initiated on the subject, the definition of mines should be reformulated to cover such activities as drilling of boreholes for exploration of gas, oil, etc.

On the agenda item relating to the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets, my Government, having ratified the Fee-charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96), is under obligation to supervise the activities of such agencies and we intend to take steps to expand government involvement in dealing with employment-related activities.

In conclusion, I would like to point out that the democratically elected Government of Bangladesh, under the leadership of Prime Minister Begum Khaleda Zia, has been trying very hard to take appropriate steps in the field of improving conditions for our workers.

The constitution of the National Law Commission, consisting of representatives of government, employers and workers, for updating and codifying the existing 44 labour laws of the country into one code may be cited as an example in point. Bangladesh has, as an elected member of the Governing Body in 1978, 1981 and 1990, voiced the sentiments and aspirations of the member States of South Asia in particular, and the least developed countries in general, and lent active support to the ILO in its standard-setting work to make the world a safer place for workers. This reaffirms our commitment, abiding faith and interest in democratic values and institutions, welfare of the toiling masses and safe working conditions for the working people. Bangladesh wishes to continue to play her active role as a Member of the ILO in future.

Mr. FREELAND (Minister of Labour, Civil Service Affairs and Cooperatives, Antigua and Barbuda) – I bring you greetings from the Government and people of Antigua and Barbuda, and wish for you what already portends to be a very successful conference. My delegation and I extend warmest congratulations to the President on his elevation to the Chair of this Conference, and also to the Vice-Chairmen. For the information of this conference, the people of Antigua and Barbuda last March returned a Labour Party to power for the fifth consecutive term. Incidentally, I have been holding the reigns as Minister of Labour from 1976 to this present time. Can anyone challenge me with the suggestion that I might be the longest serving Minister of Labour in the ILO, certainly, in the British Commonwealth? The veteran politician, Honourable Dr. V.C. Bird Snr., whose political career spanned upwards of 50 years, retired from active politics and, as party leader and Prime Minister, handed the mantle of leadership to his son, the Honourable Lester Bird. The younger Bird has brought new dynamism and thrust to the Labour Party Government. Together with his cabinet, he decided that the delegation to this 81st Session should include, for the first time, representation from the Antigua Workers' Union which is the other recognized industrial trade union supporting the opposition, in addition to representation from the Government support union, the Antigua Trades and Labour Union.

The Report of the Director-General entitled Defending values, promoting change is a concise but comprehensive approach, which encapsulates the ILO's past, present and future. Internationally, the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia are being celebrated at this time. But regionally there has been celebration of the 25th anniversary of the ILO Caribbean Office in Port-of-Spain, which services the region in a most remarkable manner.

It is significant to note that the 75th and the 50th anniversaries referred to may be presumed as being born from the womb of war because in the year 1919 that was just one year after the First World War, while 1944 was just one year after the Second World War. It was hoped that the ravages of these hostilities would have brought some semblance of sanity to mankind. Whatever the success stories of the ILO may be, they have been marred by the innumerable conflicts which have engulfed the globe. The ILO cannot be indifferent to the plight of millions whose lives are made short by, or who suffer the horrors of, war. We refer here to the bloodbath in Rwanda, the most vicious of this century, which must necessarily reach the attention of the ILO and its constituents.

The twin evils of poverty and unemployment referred to in the Director-General's Report are corollaries of war. Poverty and unemployment may indeed be manifest in peaceful situations but they are aggravated during periods of hostilities. Not only do these hostilities affect the particular countries involved directly, but also neighbouring countries who are requested to assist in whatever way possible. A call is in order for expenditures on arms and ammunition to be directed towards alleviating poverty and unemployment.

While it is true that Antigua and Barbuda can be considered to be enjoying an ongoing peace, and while our population of 64,000 and our workforce of 29,000 is within manageable proportions, and while our unemployment rate is an invisible 7 per cent, we cannot turn a deaf ear or a blind eye to global poverty and unemployment.

The Director-General's observation that the "disappearance of the communist bloc in Eastern Europe has both spurred and highlighted worldwide trends towards democracy", promises a ray of hope, the more so as the Report makes reference to the spread of democracy in Southern Europe, Eastern Europe, Asia, Africa and South America. Antigua and Barbuda endorses the proposition that the ILO should play a decisive role in new democracies that remain fragile and need urgently to be strengthened. We also agree that a strong, massive vote for democracy should become the hallmark of the ILO's activities.

In this connection, developments in South Africa cannot be sidelined. The ILO exhausted all measures and means at its disposal in causing such developments to take place. At several conference sessions before this one, member States of the ILO were vocal in their desire to see the dismantling of apartheid in South Africa. We pause to pay tribute to President Nelson Mandela and the African National Congress for making the dismantling of apartheid in South Africa a reality. Antigua and Barbuda, at both government and opposition levels, very significantly celebrated majority rule with Nelson Mandela and the rest of South Africa.

But while we rejoice to see the realization of democracy in South Africa, the Government of Antigua and Barbuda must register its disgust at the blatant and callous disregard for the democratic process right at our very doorsteps in the Caribbean island of Haiti. Antigua and Barbuda deplores the resistance of the military regime to honouring the wishes of the majority of Haitians to restore democracy by the return of the democratically elected President Jean-Bertrand Aristide.

The growth of the ILO to its current situation bringing together 171 member States and servicing 98 per cent of the earth's population is a clear indication that the ILO is here to stay and will continue to defend its values and promote change. Antigua and Barbuda is eternally grateful to the ILO for the services it has received, mainly through the ILO's Caribbean Office. By way of the ILO's technical assistance thrust, our Labour Code stands out as a model for other English-speaking Caribbean territories. Our thriving social security scheme is an ILO project and so too is our hotel training school. Within the Caribbean region, the ILO tripartite identity is retained by the ILO's mounting of workshops, seminars and the like for the benefit of representatives of the social partners. Workers' education is admirably treated by the resident expert in the speciality, from the ILO Caribbean Office. The expert recently appointed to deal with issues relating to employers is a step in the right direction.

Antigua and Barbuda is in full support of the ILO's activities for the future as the Organization maintains its hold on social justice in a global economy.

Mr. SIMEONOV (Employers' delegate, Bulgaria) – It is a great pleasure and distinct privilege for me to address this distinguished gathering of the International Labour Conference on behalf of the Bulgarian employers. First of all, I would like to congratulate the International Labour Organization on its 75th anniversary and to extend our greetings to all members of the Organization. May I also pay my respects to the President and the Vice-Presidents of the Conference and wish them every success in their duties.

During the past 75 years, the International Labour Organization has been playing an exclusive role; indeed, nowadays no one can imagine international labour relations and the solution of national labour and social legislation issues without it. The people who established the Organization drafted its Constitution and structure in such a way that they are still valid after so many years – with only few amendments. And we must not overlook the vital importance of the Declaration of Philadelphia of 1945.

Looking back over its history now, we can say that the difficult moments are already behind us. The latest changes in the world, and especially the recognition and triumph of the market economy, will not and cannot decrease the role of the ILO. The tasks before the ILO are becoming more complex with the changes that have occurred in the Central and Eastern European countries. The artificially boosted trade unions from the years of socialism (often with compulsory membership of all employees) are now experiencing a marked decrease in the number of members. Nevertheless, the democratic processes and the new conditions have allowed them to keep solid economic positions, inheriting a considerable part of the property of their predecessors, in assets or in real estate. Adding to this the far-from-negligible aid of the international trade unions and active bilateral relations, it is clear what possibilities most of the trade unions in Central and Eastern Europe still have.

What is the situation on the other side of the table in the tripartite process? In the period after the Second World War when the principles of the centrally planned economies were operating, the democratic development of the employers' structures was stopped and the prevailing trend was to lessen their role so that they would achieve a formal character only. With the changes in Central and Eastern Europe, these structures were allowed to develop freely and it was expected they would start to play the sort of role in society envisaged by the ILO. It has turned out, however, that there is still a long way to go before this situation is achieved. Knowing that even in countries with a developed market economy the employers are not always willing to allocate significant sums to their organizations, we can imagine the conditions in which the employers' organizations in Central and Eastern Europe are functioning. It is obvious to everyone that the changes in the social and labour spheres have to run parallel to the changes in the economy; and it is in these two areas where the employers' organizations have to play a key role. Evidently, it is imperative to consider seriously the issue of extending employers' solidarity – and providing direct and indirect assistance – to the employers' organizations from Central and Eastern Europe.

A good step in this direction was the Training Workshop for Central and Eastern European Employers' Organizations held in the International Training Centre of the ILO, Turin, in May 1994 with the assistance of the ILO, IOE and the Netherlands Government. We would like to thank the German Government as well for the sponsorship of the seminar in Larnaka held this year. These were only the first steps, but in our opinion they were in the right direction. The experience from this training workshop and from other programmes for assistance to the Central and Eastern European countries has indicated that there are better results when the projects are carried out by public organizations only or together with governmental ones. Only in this way will it be possible to restore quickly the balance between the employers' organizations and the trade unions in Central and Eastern Europe as an indispensable prerequisite for the progress of the tripartite process. Quite rightly, the Director-General underlined that there was a need for development both in the employers' and in the employees' organizations in the countries having chosen the way to democracy and market economy. Being their partners, we acknowledge that employees' organizations also need help, training and qualifications. Our experience in Bulgaria shows that "misunderstood" democracy in trade unions often leads to increasing political claims and to efforts to impose them under cover of tripartite cooperation. We have also witnessed unfamiliarity with the rules of tripartite cooperation in the participation of trade unions in collective bargaining, for example, when they have tried to negotiate only with the Government or to make collective labour agreements with its representatives.

The answer to the question of whether the ILO is a relevant organization or not can only be in the affirmative. Its standard-setting activity is only the beginning of the long process of putting labour standards into practice. The ILO has much to do to monitor the ratification of its instruments and carry out its supervisory activity. The growing differentiation between the richest and the poorest and the changes in Central and Eastern Europe, leading to changes in the rest of the world as well, will again and again raise the issue of putting into practice the ideas underlying the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO. There will be difficulties in Central and Eastern Europe, springing from the fact that during the period of central planning, the ILO instruments were ratified without much consideration. Now, after the changes, with the deterioration of the economic situation in these countries, it is becoming more difficult to abide by international commitments. Therefore, the international community and the States represented in the international organizations have to show a better understanding of the situation in Central and Eastern Europe.

The ILO will have to be on its guard against another tendency as well, which is bound to become more pronounced. It was rightly noted that ILO standards cannot be "more equal than others", i.e. that we cannot establish double standards. This would undermine the work of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. If there were such a tendency, it would belittle the entire standard-setting activity of the Organization and the efforts of so many of our predecessors; and this would be unfortunate now when we are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the ILO. What is more, there is another situation, when a given member State applies ILO standards without having ratified the relevant Convention, as it feels that approval of the instrument expressed at the time it was adopted by the Conference is sufficient in itself. The most rewarding aspect of the standard-setting activity of the ILO is when the standards are reflected in the legislation of the respective country and obeyed in practice. As far as the entrepreneurs are concerned their activities might result in a different application of ILO standards and different costs of labour; but it is more important that the globalization of the world economy allows for a rather free movement of capital. If a certain State provides access of foreign capital to its economy, it is quite natural that the low labour costs provide an incentive to foreign investors. With the flow of time, the rising standard of living and the interdependence of the markets will inevitably smooth out the differences.

The initial impetus of the changes in Central and Eastern Europe has allowed many private companies to register and start operation, especially in the sector of commerce. Only a limited number of employees belong to a trade union, because there are scarcely any trade unions in this sector. Successful privatization, however, will hand back production to the previous owners – and put it in the hands of new entrepreneurs; and amongst their employees will be some trade union members. The new owners must therefore be prepared to engage in collective bargaining. This process could be assisted by ILO technical assistance funds. We are convinced that it would be better to direct funds and efforts for the development of entrepreneurship. If entrepreneurs are adequately qualified and trained, they will open up new jobs. We strongly believe that when programming funds for skills training and re-training, the State should pay attention to two main aspects. The first is that funds should be allotted for the development of entrepreneurship; and the second, that when approving the re-training programmes, the needs of the entrepreneurs in certain specialities and occupations should be taken into account. Of course, this should not exclude the participation of the other partners in the tripartite process – the trade unions. What is most important is that practical needs should be considered and that priorities should not be established in the offices of advisers who have insufficient contact with business or an inadequate knowledge of entrepreneurship.

All efforts of governments, employers and trade unions have to be directed towards the creation of favourable conditions for sustained economic growth and the creation of productive jobs. The employers from Bulgaria will support any measures aimed at the achievement of the above-mentioned objectives.

Finally, I would like to wish the International Labour Organization, its bodies, its members and all engaged with the International Labour Office long years of successful and fruitful work.

Mrs. WILLIAMS (Employers' delegate, Belize) – I feel honoured to be given the privilege to address this prestigious body on behalf of the employers of Belize.

I would like to join in congratulating the Organization on its 75th anniversary. This is a true testimony to the relevance and need for the Organization's leadership role in matters connected to the world of work.

I make reference, too, to the Director-General's Report and fully agree that the time to re-examine the Organization's role is now, given the changing world which has and continues to experience major geopolitical upheavals. The accelerated globalization of the economy and the ever-changing circumstances in the workplace mean indeed that the ILO must analyze these changes and position itself to play a leading role in guiding the development of the human resources of this planet.

We have noted the new working mode of the Organization's regional offices by moving to the multidisciplinary approach. This, we feel, will prove even more useful to us in Belize as we actively seek to tap into the system, in particular to bring technical expertise to the Belizean employers in the areas of production efficiencies, health and safety and particularly exposure to the major improvements in technology.

The Belize employers' association believes in the ILO and participates in its regional activities. We attended the training course in Jamaica on the role of the employers' association in employment creation, and earlier this year we were in Trinidad and Tobago looking at the employment of disabled persons. Follow-up work and activities have been identified and are being carried out.

The cooperation programmes which I would like to see developed between Belize and the ILO's regional office centre on two areas where I feel both our organizations could benefit tremendously.

First is the need to have accurate, timely and meaningful statistics available with respect to costings and conditions in countries which have to compete for the same international investment capital and the same international funding from sources which are indeed becoming limited. This would enable a much fairer and accurate assessment to be made by independent bodies from outside the areas and would serve as a catalyst to prompt improvements for those countries lagging behind.

The second is to include practical training sessions on ILO standards. In Belize there is some apprehension with regard to these standards; it is felt in some quarters that some of the standards are being rammed down the throats of employers. With the elimination of the challenges to the universality of the standards, perhaps there is now scope to take time out to explain and educate as to how these play a part in the practical reality of businesses fighting for their survival in a very competitive world, where to stay alive may demand heavy dependence on technology improvements. At the same time, efforts should be made to encourage the maintenance of social justice.

I represent the Belize Chamber of Commerce and Industry which, some years ago, was formally asked to speak for the employers' association which had been meeting as a separate group in Belize City. This message was good in the sense that the Chamber represents the whole cross-section of employers in the country anyway. We have built a membership of 645, drawn from north to south and east to west, with 80 per cent representing micro-enterprises.

Belize, as one of the smallest and youngest developing countries in the region, had enjoyed excellent growth rates in the previous four years or so – rates approaching 10 per cent. On 30 June 1993 we saw a change of government, and whilst we understand the need to slow the economy somewhat, the economic sector is going through a prolonged period of slowed economic activity with little or no investments.

The cost to the labour market need not be gainsaid, given the present rate of unemployment in excess of 20 per cent. Belize therefore certainly needs to draw on the large resources of the ILO in order to stimulate its job market.

On the other hand, we are fortunate that human rights are respected in Belize. Also heartening is that we do not face such problems as child labour, which exist in other countries in our region; workers' rights are respected by the private sector and employers are not allowed to take advantage of their workers.

There have been discussions in Belize on using the tripartite system as regards suggested improvements to the country's labour laws. There is a move to improve benefits and the remuneration package, but employers are convinced that these must go hand in hand with improved productivity and efficiency. The NAFTA reality is reinforcing this need, bearing in mind that our businesses have to be able to compete in this new global economy.

We are very proud of our accomplishments in the environmental area, where we continue to be among the leading nations in our concern for the survival of planet Earth. However, without the injection of fresh capital, these initiatives could begin to draw criticisms from the masses who cry out for new employment opportunities.

Closer to home, besides the concern over the national economy, we have the unpleasant task of reporting on our employers' association which is in trouble and fighting for its survival.

Besides representing the majority of employers in the country, the Chamber has developed into a developmental agency. Helped by funding from USAID, the Chamber has spearheaded the development of non-traditional exports, as well as the country's investment-promotion effort. The Chamber brought entrepreneurial training to high schools and other educational institutions, and provided the business community with trade information.

However, USAID's financial assistance came to an end last July. This meant that the revenue-earning measures identified by the Chamber were expected to kick in. The main initiative was the management of the national lotto game. However, after many months it was found that the adverse state of the economy has resulted in little money left over to purchase tickets. The result is that we are seeing very small sales, and the Chamber has therefore been deprived of a major income stream.

We have written a number of project documents seeking the assistance of the international community in our bid to stay alive. We look for assistance in setting up an endowment fund, but would also like to see an entrepreneurial development project introduced in the bases, in the prison, and in the communities targeting adults who would like to begin a new business.

We are still hopeful of continuing export development and providing trade information to local business. However, all these efforts will only be possible if we are able to obtain assistance from the international community.

Finally, I close with a note of encouragement. It was good to hear that more countries are joining the Organization. This spells hope for the future, and I foresee more and more technical assistance being sought by these countries, although perhaps on a regional basis. Countries rely on the vast amount of technical expertise and wealth of knowledge built up over the years by the ILO, and feel comfortable in wanting to access this.

With the collapse of communism and the market economy becoming the universally accepted standard, people all over the world are being given new hope for the future. I agree with the Director-General when he says that the strong moves to democracy will punctuate ILO actions in the future and I wish the Organization well in continuing to encourage the building of a stronger employers' and workers' association across the globe so that they can each contribute to the strengthening of the countries' democracies, some of which are young and fragile.

I wish this historic 81st Session success in its deliberations.

Mr. AKPA (representative, United Nations Industrial Development Organization) – On behalf of the Director-General of UNIDO, Mr. Mauricio de María y Campos, I would like to thank the secretariat of the International Labour Organization for the kind invitation to address the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

We want to express our sincere congratulations on the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The ILO has indeed played a historical role as the international body dealing with solutions to employment and manpower problems, but more importantly in making labour and social peace the centre of its principles and activities.

This Conference takes place at a time when employment and production conditions in both developing and industrialized countries are subject to major changes.

Not only are new and accelerating global development in production and information technology affecting the modes, location and integration of industrial production, but they are also considerably changing the social patterns in most countries.

We are also witnessing a global wave of policy deregulation and trade liberalization, combined with an enhancement of the role of the private sector. These trends will further accentuate the internationalization of industrial production, albeit with a strong regional dimension, due to the emergence of large economic groupings. As a result of this development, new prospects, but also major challenges and increased competition, are emerging in the developing countries. In order for the developing countries to be able to utilize these prospects and to respond to these challenges, they need to strengthen their competitive capabilities and development capacities. This will certainly entail major restructuring efforts towards building up the skill intensity and new organizational forms in production as well as clean and energy-saving production to ensure sustainable growth.

Human resources development is thereby emerging as the central theme for the developing countries and for the international community and the United Nations system at large.

This theme must obviously be seen in the context of global population trends – an issue to be addressed in the forthcoming International Conference on Population and Development in Cairo in September this year.

While the population in industrialized countries is expected to remain constant, in most developing countries the population continues to grow at a high rate, thus creating serious employment problems in the short as well as in the long run.

Human resources development is thus a pivotal factor in the complex process of employment creation, the improvement of social conditions, industrial restructuring and competitiveness, entrepreneurship development, sustained economic growth and international competitiveness. This process sets a new framework for the training of human resources as an investment for the future. To that end, it is important for developing countries to re-examine not only the content, structure and form of education and training, but also the benefits and costs of specific human resources development and its direct linkage with industrial strategies and policies.

In building up and expanding competitive industrial activities, including the introduction of new science and technology-intensive and skill-intensive industries, increasing demands are also emerging for the educational system to contribute towards addressing the problems of redundancies as well as retraining and redeployment of manpower. At the same time, the wave of privatization of public sector enterprises and the general reduction of employment in the public sector will necessitate a major redeployment of the labour force. This implies a pressing need to launch programmes for retraining so as to alleviate unemployment and to facilitate the transition towards an increasingly efficient private sector.

Human resources policies would thus need to relate education and training to employment policies and industrial policies, particularly in the light of the contribution that education and training could make towards meeting the growing demand for skilled labour as well as strengthening industrial entrepreneurship in developing countries.

UNIDO itself has recently undergone a process of restructuring and setting new priorities in order to adapt to the present needs of developing countries and to improve its efficiency and effectiveness. Two of the five development objectives established in this process specifically focus on development of human resources for industry and equitable development through industrial development.

The objective – equitable development through industrial development – addresses the need for full participation of all segments of the population in the economic growth process. This means that from the outset, industrial development will have to focus on increasing welfare among the population through the creation of industrial opportunities, thus linking industrial growth to the alleviation of poverty. The gradual transformation of an agrarian society into an industrial economy and the subsequent improvements in productivity are in themselves important mechanisms for combating poverty. At the same time, specific measures are called for to ensure equitable development through industry. These include developing industrial entrepreneurship, increasing the participation of women in industry and promoting small and medium-sized enterprises. Particular emphasis will also be given by UNIDO to developing rural industries and ensuring close industry-agriculture linkages with a view to reducing the often glaring regional disparities in economic development.

UNIDO views human resources development as a matter of primordial concern in the industrial context. It is both an important precondition for, as well as a result of, industrialization. With the emerging new paradigm for industrial development, the educational and training systems in developing countries at the national, regional and enterprise levels need to be reassessed and sharpened in their focus. Human resources development is directly linked with the developing countries' ability to build up capabilities for development, transfer industrial technology and carry out restructuring of industry towards a sustainable growth pattern, including skill-intensive activities and industrial services, as well as a whole range of other long-term industrialization issues.

With human resources development as the centrepiece in a complex development process, the United Nations system needs to enhance its efforts in this field in a cohesive way. UNIDO will be pleased to further strengthen the excellent cooperation with ILO and with other bodies and agencies of the United Nations system in our joint effort to support member countries in their endeavours to bring about economic growth and social development.

As the Secretary-General of the United Nations mentioned in his thought-provoking statement to this Conference: "Today we have the task of reinventing a new mode of life in our societies". Let us ensure together that this daunting task is won for the best of global society. You can count on UNIDO in this new partnership for a sustainable human development.

(Mr. Matinchev takes the Chair.)

Mr. BIJEDIC (Government delegate, The Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina) On behalf of the Government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, I would like to express our congratulations to all members of the ILO and to the ILO secretariat on the 75th anniversary of the Organization, and the 50th anniversary of its activity within the United Nations system.

We in Bosnia and Herzegovina are well aware of all the valuable and important activities the ILO has undertaken during its long period of existence, especially its contribution in the fields of social protection, standards, norms – especially for the human and working environment.

Unfortunately, we have to admit that our present situation of war prevents us from implementing most of the Conventions this Organization has adopted so far.

Although I believe you are well informed about the aggression and genocide being committed in my country by our neighbours Serbia and Montenegro, violating all human rights – including the right to life, health and work – I feel obliged to inform you about at least some of the cruel facts.

During the 25 months of aggression on my country, we have registered in Bosnia and Herzegovina: 250,000 killed or missing citizens of all nationalities; 300,000 wounded of whom 30,000 are disabled; 2,200,000 refugees – this represents 50 per cent of the total population, and 1,200,000 of these persons have been displaced to foreign countries; not to mention the effects of material damages, "urbicide" and "culturcide".

Among the slain, wounded, displaced and refugees, 65 per cent are young working people. Economic activity, employment and national income fell by 80 per cent. Houses, factories and other production facilities, and public utilities have, for the most part, been destroyed; our citizens, 50 per cent of whom are displaced persons, literally live on international humanitarian aid. Seeing all the suffering my people are going through, I am personally in a dilemma as to whether to thank your governments and the United Nations for their efforts in helping my people to survive, or to reproach your governments and the United Nations for not having been able to respect the basic obligations towards a Member of the United Nations, especially its right to self-defence.

The international community has been actively involved in the tragedy of my country on wrong premises and with inadequate means. Now, it is still reticent to correct its attitude and to help in resolving the problem in order to reach a just and durable peace.

The aggressors are still attacking our cities and villages. Peace negotiations are protracted, while aggression continues. The aggressors are dictating conditions for a peace settlement. There is no international pressure to stop the aggressor or enable the victim to defend itself. In that light, there seems no possibility of implementing the right of refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes (over 900,000 citizens). The United Nations and the recently established Contact Group have been making efforts to strike a just peace deal, although without any significant progress so far.

By constituting the Federation of Bosnians and Croats on the free territories of our Republic, we have established realistic preconditions for planning the repatriation of some of our refugees and displaced persons, as well as for starting the reconstruction of our country – for essential production and for setting up minimal conditions for re-employment.

The objectives of our Government are the following: helping the population survive; rehabilitating the injured and disabled to permit retraining and employment; relaunching domestic production, primarily of food and certain other necessary items; and mobilizing our manpower, both refugees from abroad and those still in the country for any type of productive activity.

Currently, our biggest concern is to provide housing for our repatriates, either through reconstruction or new building work, and to employ people in the production of food and construction materials.

One solution is to promote the setting up of small businesses and the rapid rebuilding of economic infrastructure, for which the help of your countries will be absolutely necessary.

I would like to express our sincere gratitude to the governments of those countries which have offered hospitality to our refugees. Furthermore, we would appreciate it if some of these refugees could be given skills training and some sort of employment. Furthermore, we will be asking your assistance in organizing the return of our refugees to their homes as soon as the necessary conditions are re-established.

Finally, the most valuable help to us is to enable our citizens to return to their homes and their work in their home country. In the firm belief that the solidarity between the world's workers which we know so well from the past, will be demonstrated anew in the future. I should like to thank you once again for the help you have extended to us so far.

Original Arabic: Mr. GAREEB (Workers' delegate, Iraq) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is a pleasure for me to greet this assembly on my own behalf and on behalf of the long-suffering Iraqi workers, and I take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Gray, the President of the Conference on his election to the chair of the 81st Session. I also wish the Officers of the Conference every success in their work.

The workers of Iraq have asked me to report to you and to all the delegates in this room on the pain and suffering they are enduring because of the unjust economic embargo that has been imposed on our country. Because of that embargo, factories are closing, prices are rising, essential medical drugs are becoming so difficult to find that even operations sometimes have to be performed without anaesthetic. The number of children who have died now exceeds 500,000, epidemics rage, foodstuffs are almost impossible to find and the people of my country are crushed by the horror of genocide. In the light of this dreadful situation, the feeling of indifference that we see in some circles is flagrantly at odds with humanitarian values and with divine and human law.

While slogans on human rights and freedom of association are bandied about, the American Administration use their power on the international political stage to perpetuate the infamous economic blockade by using false arguments for well-known imperialist purposes to the detriment of the Iraqi people who are threatened with genocide.

In the International Year of the Child, the children of Iraq are exterminated and as humanitarian movements work to protect the family, Iraqi families are being wiped out. It has become clear that the aim of the continued embargo and the pursuit of a policy of starvation and deprivation for political purposes is quite simply to exterminate our people. Deliberate oppressive action of this kind is totally at variance with the just and constructive principles on which the conscience of the international community is based.

In the light of this situation, there is an urgent need for all people of good will in the world to speak out in favour of a lifting of the economic embargo against Iraq, especially since there is no further justification for it inasmuch as Iraq has been cooperating constructively with the United Nations and the Security Council and has fulfilled its commitments to them.

It is unreasonable, unacceptable and unlawful that a people should be exposed to genocide and denied any role in modern life. We wish to remind you of a well-known fact, namely that Iraq was one of the founders of civilization, a pioneer in establishing and spreading the principles of justice and equity, and a people that have rendered valuable and outstanding services to humankind.

Such a people deserves support and solidarity from the international community, especially since it is asking for nothing more than to enjoy the rights granted to other peoples, its natural rights laid down in international legislation and instruments.

The International Labour Organization, which has always adopted serious and responsible positions whenever it has been asked to intervene, is now being asked to adopt such a position vis-à-vis the workers of Iraq. We urge the Director-General of the ILO to attach particular importance to this matter, so that the necessary support and assistance are made available to Iraqi workers to alleviate their sufferings due to the continuation of the unjust embargo.

There are many important questions on the agenda for this Conference concerning the activities of the Organization and its effectiveness, draft resolutions for discussion and the new ideas and working methods stemming from the changes occurring in the world.

It is in this context of change that we are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the Organization, recalling the humanitarian values on which it was founded and searching for the future path it should follow to meet the major challenges posed by the tendency to give free rein to market forces, a system which, if applied without restraint and without protecting the basis and principles of social justice, especially workers' rights, undermines the foundations of social balance and increases all kinds of inequalities and all forms of oppression. It is very important that we should study and understand what needs to be done and achieved to prevent might from becoming right and to put an end to the use of international institutions as a means of starving peoples and for political aims. If, for example, we reject child labour, we must reject even more emphatically the extermination of children and denying them access to food and medicine, since this is a flagrant violation of the most basic of human rights, the right to life, but this is what is happening to the children of Iraq.

The Director-General's choice of the subject Defending values, promoting change, a scientific analysis of prospects for social justice in the world economy and in the context of the ILO, is a felicitous and commendable one.

We agree with the content of that Report, particularly the affirmation that "it would be dangerous indeed if the ILO were to appear to be serving the interests of certain countries or certain segments of society".

The embargo imposed on Iraqi workers, exposing them to a slow but certain death, is tragic; it has convinced them that some countries are exerting influence on international humanitarian organizations and that we are witnessing a particularly serious new phenomenon: double standards are being applied.

The Iraqi workers can find no other forum than the International Labour Organization to express their suffering. Indeed, the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, its regulations, its instruments and the Reports of the Director-General all give them the right to hope that the international community will come to their aid, support them in their endeavours and meet their needs. If we take truly to heart the major ideas contained in the Director-General's Report, we are more entitled than anyone else to receive aid.

We are at present undergoing a thorough overhaul of the structure and running of the International Labour Organization to try to determine its most positive aspects and to consolidate them. The profound changes we are experiencing in the world today should make us, at this session, examine our role most critically so that we can define the future action of the Organization and that of our social partners. We therefore have to establish guidelines, taking into account resolutions, recommendations and trade union rights. We must ensure that we can absorb and deal with the social repercussions occurring throughout the world in order to reinforce democracy and social justice.

Iraq has been a member of this Organization since 1932 and we are therefore very committed to its future. The Arab region as a whole trusts that it will increase its support and strive even more to put an end to the oppression, arbitrary practices and racial discrimination exercised by the Israeli authorities in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories.

We should like to take this opportunity to express our satisfaction with developments in South Africa and to pray for unity in Yemen.

All success comes from God.

Mr. OGBEMUDIA (Minister of Labour and Productivity, Federal Secretariat II, Nigeria) – My delegation wishes to join earlier speakers in congratulating the President and the other Officers of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference on their election. This Conference is indeed a memorable one in the life of this Organization as it coincides with the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

It is gratifying to note that the anniversary celebration is taking place at a critical moment when the entire world is witnessing dramatic socio-economic and political changes. The last few years have witnessed the end of East-West conflict, increasing democratization in many countries and the emergence of regional economic groupings. These visible changes provide new opportunities as well as challenges to strengthen the ILO in an international environment devoid of ideological conflicts. We also have the chance to formulate a new vision for the ILO, a vision that will guide the Organization to the twenty-first century.

I sincerely congratulate the Government and people of South Africa on the death of apartheid and the birth of genuine all-inclusive participatory democracy. The role of the ILO in the struggle is highly commended. We welcome the readmission of the new South Africa into the ILO and call on the Organization to assist the people of South Africa to heal the wounds inflicted during their years of struggle against apartheid.

The impact of the ILO has been and is still being felt all over the world, as it has contributed to the promotion of social justice and world peace. We believe very strongly that the ILO could play a greater role in securing more multilateral economic assistance to poor countries, especially in sub-Saharan Africa. The ILO could also channel a greater percentage of its technical cooperation programmes to these countries to facilitate economic growth. Indeed, it could teach them to fish rather than to just give them fish.

We know that to be able to effectively design and implement our national economic and social policies we must adopt a position consistent with the growing practice of tripartism. We realize that the involvement of all the parties concerned in the design and implementation of policies make it possible not only to strike a fair balance between the demands of economic development and social protection, but also provides the best possible avenues for the effective implementation of the policies concerned in a harmonious industrial relations atmosphere.

In view of the central role of agriculture in economic development in Africa, we call on the ILO to expand its activities in the rural sector, with a view to strengthening national capacity in food production and reducing unemployment.

We wish to commend the ILO for the vocational training and advisory services programme. Nigeria has benefited from this programme. We urge the Organization to enhance and broaden its training to generate self-employment as wage employment cannot expand at the rate required to absorb the current and future additions to the labour force.

Since the debt crisis began in the past decade, developing countries have embarked on structural adjustment programmes that have had dire consequences for wage employment especially in the public sector. Africa has been most affected by these reforms. The ILO, in the pursuit of its mandate, should strengthen collaboration with the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund and devise safety components to cushion the impact of these economic adjustments.

My Government supports the standard-setting activities of the ILO. This has become a very important function of the Organization and an essential instrument for promoting social justice and formulating progressive and far-sighted labour legislation and policies in many countries.

It is in demonstration of this support that Nigeria ratified two ILO Conventions, namely the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) and the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) in April 1994 as part of our contribution to commemorate the 75th anniversary of the ILO. This brings to 30 the number of Conventions ratified by Nigeria. However, rigidity and the wide scope of some standards have militated against their ratification. It is essential that differences in national situations and levels of development be taken into consideration in formulating Conventions. Consequently, flexibility should be incorporated into these standards to guarantee wider acceptability, especially among developing countries.

This leads me to the issue of implementation and the role of the supervisory bodies. These bodies should continue to perform their functions to ensure the application of standards. However, they should take cognizance of the difficult situation prevailing in developing countries. They should also be less legalistic and technical in their approach. It is inconceivable that the same standards of performance should be expected from both developed and developing countries. Even when they are well intentioned, many developing countries lack the necessary resources for implementation of many of these standards. It would, therefore, be advisable for the supervisory bodies to take the level of development of a country into consideration in the application of the standards it has ratified.

Before concluding, I would like to refer briefly to the political reforms in my country. We are aware that political democracy, market economy and tripartism are inseparable and none of these can be fully achieved without the other. Nigeria has embarked on a new transition programme which recognizes our historical and cultural peculiarities. Our objective remains the establishment and entrenchment of lasting democracy. We can confirm that this is a task Nigeria is committed to.

Once again, we congratulate the ILO on its anniversary celebrations. It is our hope and prayer that the ILO will continue to make immense contributions to the social and economic development of the world, in general, and of the developing countries, in particular.

Mr. TUDOR (Government delegate, Barbados) – On behalf of the Barbados delegation, I join with the other speakers in congratulating Mr. Gray on his election to the high office of President of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference during the historic 75th year of the International Labour Organization. I would like to assure him of the support of the Barbados delegation in the deliberations of this Conference. I have no doubt that under his chairmanship this session will succeed in maintaining the principal objectives and high standards of the Organization.

When the Declaration of Philadelphia was enunciated 50 years ago the world was still embroiled in war, and the triumph of democracy in South Africa was not foreseeable. Now democracy has been established in that country. We are proud to be associated with President Mandela and the people of South Africa in promoting an orderly transition of power. In Barbados we are extremely fortunate to have participated in the arrangements for the first "all-race" elections.

The efforts of the International Labour Organization over the past 24 years in bringing the South African situation to the attention of the world community are noteworthy. Barbados applauds the work of the Organization in this respect and takes pleasure in reaffirming solidarity with those countries, organizations and persons whose efforts are geared to the removal of the vestiges of apartheid.

Shortly after his historic release from prison, Mr. Mandela addressed this Conference during its 79th Session in 1990. He impressed those present with his sincerity and commitment to pursue a vision of peace and unity in his country notwithstanding the bitter experiences of the past. Although imprisoned for a quarter of a century, Mr. Mandela did not pursue revenge or retaliation, but rather sought peaceful solutions to the problems.

We are sure that under his leadership South Africa will build a positive image in the world. The Government of Barbados joins with other Members of this Organization in wishing the people of South Africa much success in their quest to end racial injustice and build a harmonious society which offers equal opportunity for all. We trust that, as we review the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, our deliberations and recommendations will lead to the development of concrete measures for aiding in the rebuilding process.

Turning to the agenda of the Conference, I note that under the fourth item we will examine the subject of part-time work as a means of reducing unemployment. This is an area of some concern to us and should be discussed against the background of existing laws in member States.

In Barbados for example, annual paid holidays do not depend on the hours worked, but rather on the total number of days worked. Under the Holidays with Pay Act, therefore, a daily paid employee working three or more days per week would qualify for paid holiday if he or she worked for a full year. Consequently, a person working less than three days per week would not qualify for holidays with pay. Any attempt to reduce the number of days may have the effect of neutralizing our national laws.

Under the provisions of any new standards, the Conference must ensure that, in promoting part-time work as an alternative to full-time employment, workers are not excluded from certain social security and other benefits to which they are entitled to at present. These would include conditions of employment, especially where the earning hours of work are set below the thresholds established by individual member countries. It will then be important to ensure that the basic wages paid to part-time workers are not lower than the wages paid to full-time workers in cases where both are paid on an hourly basis.

Part-time work is not an ideal means of correcting the unemployment situation. As an alternative, measures aimed at creating full-time jobs which would generate adequate levels of income should be encouraged. It is incumbent on the social partners to explore all avenues to increase employment opportunities wherever possible.

Consequently, the Barbados delegation recommends that serving workers should be given the freedom to choose between full-time and part-time employment as this would avert involuntary transfer from full-time to part-time work. In addition, in the event that a worker refuses to transfer from full-time to part-time work, it would not constitute a valid reason for termination of employment.

The Government of Barbados is committed to a reduction of the high level of unemployment and recognizes that proper development is the most effective way of achieving this objective. Since the achievement of productivity gains will assume greater importance when economic growth is declining, emphasis should therefore be placed on establishing and maintaining improvements in productivity standards in order to increase efficiency and international competitiveness.

In this 50th year since the Declaration of Philadelphia, we need to mobilize joint creative energies to promote and retain the letter and spirit of the Declaration. In the face of social and economic conditions where workers are constantly being asked to make sacrifices in the interest of technical advances, it is essential that efforts at achieving economies of scale do not nullify the Declaration. Consequently, individual constituent actions will have wider and deeper effect at the global level.

The Organization must listen to the voices of its smaller and economically weaker member States. Any proposal to revise existing international labour standards must take account of the special needs and circumstances of developments within national territorial boundaries. Although many developing countries have not found it possible to ratify and implement specific Conventions and Recommendations, in many cases national laws and practices have incorporated some of the fundamental principles and provisions of these instruments.

For example, in Barbados, the Employment of Women (Maternity Leave) Act provides that every female employee should be entitled to maternity leave in addition to her annual holiday under the Holidays with Pay Act. This leave extends to a total of twelve weeks and covers the periods both before and after confinement.

The Barbados delegation notes with some concern the proposal in some quarters to revise the Maternity Protection Convention, 1919 (No. 3), and the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103). Any revision should improve rather than reduce the benefits to the workers, in this case females, so that their rights would continue to be protected and enhanced.

At this important time in the life of the Organization, it is incumbent on the social partners to utilize the framework of the ILO for arriving at a consensus on the thorny issues that characterize contemporary labour management relations. Failure to do this may well lead to a decline in the benefits to be derived by the respective social partners, and ultimately to a fragmentation of the membership of the Organization. History will not pardon us if we allow this to happen.

In closing, I assure you again that the Barbados delegation will play its rightful role in the deliberations of this historic session of the Conference, thus helping to promote its successful conclusion.

I wish the Conference every success. God bless you.

Original Spanish: Mr. ALVAREZ POSADA (Employers' adviser, Colombia) – May I first of all offer my congratulations through you to the entire Conference on the occasion of the anniversaries of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia. I would like to pay tribute to Jairo Escobar Padrón, who for over a decade and until last year helped elevate the deliberations of the Governing Body as an Employer member from Colombia.

The 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia deserve special recognition from the Employers. Throughout these years we have shared the basic principles of the Organization: tripartism, social progress, freedom of association and the development of productive employment. However, the move towards a real market economy requires structural adjustments involving efforts and sacrifices. The globalization of the economy inevitably will mean the need to compete. The end of the Cold War, and also the new tension characterizing the last decade of this century, have contributed to the need to find a new role for the United Nations.

We feel, as the Director-General rightly said in his Report, that we must first and foremost preserve the basic principles which gave rise to the Organization. Now more than ever, tripartism and social dialogue must play a major role as exceptional mechanisms for the adoption of social policies to improve living conditions.

Indeed, the new economic model opens up opportunities, but it also demands sacrifices and generates disruptions which are not always easy to overcome. These adjustments require a special capacity for adaptation in macroeconomic and social policies, as well as in productive processes. There must be formal commitment by governments, employers and workers to overcome the difficulties and take advantage of opportunities.

If we combine our efforts we can achieve the most noble objectives. A cooperative attitude will beyond any doubt enable us to change the relationship between the different sectors and make it easier to identify joint objectives to guide the activities of the ILO. There are many fields which are prime candidates for such joint efforts, where the objectives of growth and social development are one and the same and where the aim is to minimize the sacrifices required by the globalization of the economy.

Today, as we are witnessing the decline of the centrally-planned economy and the resurgence of the market as the best system to create wealth and fuel development, it is more important than ever for the social partners, governments, employers and workers, to devise creative social policies.

The responsibility of each of the social partners is a political responsibility as well. The new conditions require that employers and workers become genuine social and political actors who participate actively in decision-making, helping to define the objectives and priorities of economic and social development.

I would also like to make some comments on another of the basic principles of the ILO. That is the

In his Report, the Director-General reminds us that throughout the world the private enterprise is reassuming the important place it deserves in the economy. Therefore, we must determine how it can be the single most important factor in the successful economic development of nations, in raising standards of living, in reducing unemployment and, finally, in counteracting the adverse effects of structural adjustment processes.

The standard-setting activities of the ILO and its cooperation mechanisms must serve to promote favourable conditions in member States for the creation of productive jobs. Only an economy guided towards this goal can truly and efficiently fight poverty and social marginalization.

Furthermore, within the traditional fields of its competence the ILO should contribute to establishing those conditions which can enable States to achieve progress in the fields of labour markets, the development of human resources and social rights.

For the future activities of the ILO to be consistent with the new realities, we must emphasize that the old theories which maintained that class struggle was inherent to labour relations; have become obsolete. We must find a new model of labour relations one which is based on dialogue, consultation, exchange of information and a cooperative approach rather than on conflict.

Therefore, the enterprise must be seen as a community of human beings who, working together, seek a joint objective. That is why Pope John Paul II conceived of the enterprise in the Centesimus Annus Encyclical as a community of persons who in various ways are endeavouring to satisfy their basic needs, and who form a particular group at the service of the whole of society.

The employers recognize the importance of the standard-setting work of the ILO enshrined in the Conventions and Recommendations approved by the International Labour Conference. Its specific value stems from the drafting procedures which enable tripartite participation of all member States on an equal footing and also derives from the Organization's impartial supervisory mechanisms. This work remains one of the means to foster world progress based on consensus between the social forces and the free commitment of States at all levels of developments.

A few simple provisions, more adapted to reality, will facilitate the ratification and application of Conventions by the member States. The International Labour Code which was created by way of Conventions and Recommendations needs to be adapted to the new times.

We must emphasize how the Director-General is considering the relevance of the existing standards and the advisability of preserving them. In the past this was one of the employers' concerns. It seems that there is no consistency between the adoption of standards and their later ratification. This problem is not new and can be explained to a great extent by the inapplicability of the texts adopted. The different levels of development of the countries concerned can have a certain influence, but this is not the main reason. The exaggeratedly complex and detailed nature of the provisions render ratification difficult, even for the most advanced countries, and the text reaffirms

There are also mechanisms other than standard-setting to help achieve the ILO's objectives. There are technical cooperation and consultative services which should not be subject to conditions such as the application of standards. Often these are the most suitable ways of effectively improving working conditions; their shortcomings are mostly due to technical incompetence and not to ill will.

When the ILO was created, some of its protagonists considered its task not as a simple progressive harmonization of social protection throughout the world, but rather as a means of eliminating the existence of inferior working conditions, and a legitimate way of promoting competition on an equal footing between enterprises and nations. This objective was overcome by the constituents of the ILO, because they found that persuasion is a better and more realistic way of achieving their goals.

It is true that the relation between social protection and equality of trade was one of the ideas which underlaid the inception of the ILO. There are still some signs of this in the Preamble of the Constitution and in the reports of the discussions that took place during the first decades of the ILO's existence. But we must recall that the Organization was made up at the time mainly by industrialized countries.

However, even at that time the Constitution provided that the ILO, in the performance of its mission, should "have due regard to those countries in which climatic conditions, the imperfect development of industrial organization, or other special circumstances make the industrial conditions substantially different". In this case, the modifications proposed in standards should meet the case of the specific conditions of such countries (article 19.3).

The wording the authors of the Constitution chose for voluntary ratification excludes any obligation in order to ensure a certain uniformity in social protection. Furthermore, the mass entry of the Third World into the ILO has introduced into its strategy the concept of unequal development, a concept which must be preserved in order to guarantee the efficiency of international labour standards.

Finally, and to end this brief review of the needs for modernization of the ILO, I consider of major importance the debates and conclusions concerning this subject adopted by the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I trust that the discussions will enable us to adopt the best programme of work to lead the ILO into the future.

Original Russian: Mr. GONCHARIK (Workers' delegate, Belarus) – May I join the congratulations to the President on his election to such a high office and wish him every success in his work.

On behalf of the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus, I would also like cordially to congratulate the President and all the delegates at the Session of the Conference marking the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization. Taking a glance over the path it has followed, it would be not be an exaggeration to say that the ILO is, on the whole, fulfilling its vocation, namely helping to strengthen social justice in the world.

In this connection, the subject of the Director-General's Report in our opinion was a felicitous choice. The problem is indeed topical.

A quest for social justice is inherent in the very doubt, as is the fact that the main condition for his or her social protection, development and well-being is the ability to earn a decent living. Defending this value by the means available to trade unions is what we believe is our main task. In the recently adopted Constitution of the Republic of Belarus an article was included at the behest of our trade union centre, under which the State guarantees the right to work as the most worthy means of self-assertion, and creates conditions for full employment. It also enshrines the right to strike.

Such an approach corresponds to the definition of the country in the Constitution as a social State.

Evidently it is a noble aim. Unfortunately so far things are different in real life: economic ties have been severed, the financial and credit system has collapsed, production has slumped and people's standard of living has fallen.

This year alone national income dropped by more than one-third. Inflation has risen, and many people have found themselves living below the breadline. Both open and concealed unemployment are on the increase. This is affecting young people and women in particular. As a consequence, social tension in society is increasing.

In supporting the creation of a socially oriented market economy we oppose the resolution of this task at the expense of workers, their health and well-being.

For this reason, we are raising the question of the immediate drafting and implementation of a new State social and economic policy – a policy carried out in the interests of people and intelligible to them. Its aims firstly should be to halt the impoverishment of the people and prevent mass unemployment while strengthening labour motivation through fair wages; secondly, it should protect the productive and scientific and technical potential which has been created and overcome the chaotic slump in output; thirdly, urgent measures should be taken with regard to structural adjustment in the economy, especially by stimulating the production of foodstuffs and consumer goods and services.

We advocate a sober reappraisal of the structure of state property, modifying it by raising economic efficiency, and not lining the pockets of certain categories of the population.

On the whole, movement along the path of reform should be socially secure. Thus, instead of illusions and euphoria over the deceptive proximity of the market there should be measured action.

There is an evident need to strengthen the protection of workers' rights. Above all, we have stepped up participation in the creation of a legal basis regulating the world of work. Thus we have managed to halt consideration in the Government of a draft labour code which in essence impaired workers' rights, the rights of trade unions, and indeed those of employers.

We are seeking to ensure that in national legislation and policy the necessary changes are introduced in order to guarantee compliance with the main demands of international standards. Of all the ILO Conventions, just 42 have been ratified in our country so far, but we are convinced that the most important point is not how many Conventions have been ratified but that they should actually be effec-

One of the urgent tasks for us at the moment is the creation and implementation of a mechanism for social partnership. Consultations with Government and employers' associations have become common practice, as have joint working groups which try to find consensus on differences which arise when signing collective, sectoral agreements. We see this as the product of rational compromise.

We have acquired a certain amount of experience in collective bargaining at the level of the enterprises. This right is enshrined in the Act on collective agreements which has been studied by experts from the ILO. We urge that consideration be given to equal rights in social dialogue and we count on further expert consultations and support from ILO specialists.

I would like to express heartfelt appreciation and gratitude to the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, and the ILO staff for their assistance in solving the complex problems before us. The rich experience and practical assistance of the ILO has been most useful to us in resolving such fundamental problems facing workers as employment, vocational retraining and occupational safety and health.

Thus, on the basis of this, in my country for example, how would we like to see the ILO develop? We want it to increase its clout as an influential international organization and for this it is necessary for it to become more operational and more flexible in its work, including in the study of new problems in countries, especially those in the process of moving over to a market economy, and the development of specific recommendations which may provide a genuine source of information and model.

In the Report in principle a correct assessment of the Organization is given, namely that the ILO is the "social conscience of the world". For this purpose, priorities must be the guaranteeing of a balance of interests and consequently stimulae for all participants in labour relations: governments, employers and workers. Therefore, a downward revision of the strength of international standards would be a step backwards and might trigger further assaults on workers' rights.

Thus, it is extremely important to protect the tripartite nature of the ILO, the universality of its Conventions and Recommendations, and the supervisory mechanism, while improving them by taking into account new conditions in the world.

I hope that the work of this Session of the Conference will be fruitful and make it possible for constructive approaches and initiatives to be found on the path to democracy and progress, and hope.

Original Arabic: Mr ABOU RIZK (Workers' delegate, Lebanon) – I should first like to join previous speakers in congratulating the President on his election to the chair of this landmark Session of the International Labour Conference. This election is the fruit of lengthy efforts deployed within this Organization and in the world trade union movement as a whole.

Turning to the substance of the matter before us, may I say that, having read the Report of the Director-General carefully, I would have liked this special Session, which is being held on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the establishment of this Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, to engage in a special discussion of exceptional topics in addition to the important topics before us. In spite of the urgent nature of these topics, they are perhaps not on an equal footing with the major challenge facing the International Labour Organization and the international community as a whole on the eve of this twenty-first century.

On this anniversary, we feel the need to develop and invigorate our Organization. This by no means implies, nor can it ever be allowed to imply, that this great international institution has failed or that it is suffering from a basic imbalance that calls for a reappraisal of its constituent elements. Far from it. We believe that the International Labour Organization, despite occasional setbacks, has achieved important and tangible results and made a widespread and favourable impact, not only on labour markets but also on human relations and their economic and political results in general.

However, I should like to point out that political, economic and social circumstances today are quite different from those that prevailed when the International Labour Organization was created in 1919. They are also different from the general context that made the ILO so essential and prompted it to forge ahead with the Declaration of Philadelphia in 1944. We are therefore hoping for a solid new structure with flexible, fast and efficient mechanisms, a body capable of moving in tandem with the other organizations of the United Nations system; and the United Nations itself is certainly in need of new blood! We are aspiring for an Organization that can work together with the other international organizations to reaffirm the lofty principles for which it was created and towards which it has striven for many years – in particular justice and social peace – strengthening its tripartite working method involving governments, employers and workers in order to achieve these lofty shared objectives.

The twenty-first century is drawing nigh with momentous and dangerous new and complex challenges of great diversity: falling wages; increased aggression against the individual as a factor of production and a rational being, the squandering of resources and the widening gap in their distribution, and worsening and ever more diverse social problems.

The necessary development of this Organization calls for the strengthening of the existing machinery to ensure that Conventions do not remain "dead letters", trade union freedoms are strengthened and protected in practice and not just through lip-service, and effective institutional machinery is available for receiving complaints and responding quickly. We also hope for more effective quantitative and qualitative protection for labour and careful preparation for the World Summit for Social Development next year so that it produces the desired new departure.

We in the General Confederation of Lebanese Workers have additional cause for complaint in the area of efficiency, especially since we represent a people that is attached, nay addicted, to freedom, democracy and justice. A simple example of what I mean is the fact that more than 15 months ago, we lodged an urgent complaint against the Lebanese Government for its clear violation of democratic and trade union rights – but no decision has been taken to date in this connection. And when the decision is adopted, we may have to wait years for the means to proceed to implementation, enforcement and further processing in a country whose Government has ratified only 37 Conventions and which does not always implement those it has ratified.

Today, we believers in international law, are lodging an additional complaint against the Lebanese Government concerning a number of documented violations which may be summarized as follows: undermining of freedom of association; direct interference in our internal affairs and attempts to influence our decisions – not to mention the pursuit of a policy that has led to a decline in wages. In fact, what we earn today is 10 to 20 per cent of what we were earning in 1983. The share of wages in GDP, which was 55 per cent before the war, has dropped to 15 per cent today.

The Lebanese people as a whole are suffering from a general decline in their quality of life and standard of living, largely due to taxes, high inflation, unemployment which is running in some cases at 30 per cent, rapidly increasing public debt equivalent to close on 75 per cent of GDP, poor or non-existent public services, the destruction of infrastructure and the heavy burden on the society and the economy of many years of war and frequently misguided policies.

We are aware that after a war a resumption of activities requires sacrifices. We are ready to make those sacrifices but human beings are more important than stones. Reconstruction must not take place at the expense of workers and cannot be achieved through the destruction of human beings. Social and economic policies and wise financial policies must in no way undermine human dignity and fundamental freedoms.

We firmly believe that real peace and a healthy new society must be built upon freedom, social justice and democracy, and positive cooperation among all the social partners. We are also – and above all – attached to national sacred principles: first and foremost, to the struggle for the liberation of our territory from Israeli occupation so that the Lebanese authorities may extend their power throughout the entire territory; we also want to strengthen our brotherly relations with our other Arab brothers – particularly with the Syrian Arab Republic – within the framework of national unity, sovereignty of the State, independence, democracy and justice.

The Lebanese people, who are proud of their contribution to civilization, are worthy of the support of all their friends to help them overcome these hard times. The people of Lebanon deserve to live; they deserve life and support. Lebanon is the responsibility of its citizens; but it is also the responsibility of any human being who aspires to peace, freedom and justice throughout the world.

Mr. SUK-BUM (Representative of the International Federation of Building and Woodworkers (IFBWW)) – I represent the IFBWW. I am also President of the Korean Federation of Construction Trade Unions (KFCTU) in the Republic of Korea. My federation is a member of the independent, democratic Korean Council of Trade Unions (KCTU) that is separate from the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU). I am honoured to address you on behalf of the independent, democratic unions in the Republic of Korea.

I would like to congratulate and offer my support to the President and Vice-Presidents on their election. I am convinced that this session of the Conference will be even more successful under their leadership, thanks to their efforts and outstanding experience.

First and foremost, I should like to emphasize that many countries are attempting to turn back the clock on working conditions or to restrict trade union rights by invoking difficult conditions of economic development or national interests and by conniving with government powers. I insist that the ILO should be changed into a stronger organization with more positive and substantial binding authority to work against the suppression of good conditions of work and the elimination of these rights.

This is the question we have to debate at this session.

Korea has achieved high economic growth thanks to the workers' efforts, but social discontent is growing because of the imbalance of wealth. The present civilian government in Korea has promised many things, such as the revision of labour laws and the reinstatement of the dismissed. But there has not been any change at all. Korea is one of the few countries that deprives workers of freedom of association.

The urgent issue of revision in Korea is focused on the repeal of the ban on a multi-trade union system and the restriction of the right to unite. The latter prohibits government employees and teachers from organizing. As for the ban on a multi-trade union system, the Korean Government has shown its will to revise it. In response to this problem the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association recommended in March of last year the revision of labour laws.

Unfortunately, the Federation of Korean Trade Unions, which considers itself representative, is strongly against revising the labour law. Their reason is that trade unions must be one. To be sure, I agree it is natural to unite in a single trade union. But a one-trade-union system should be established autonomously by democratic, independent procedures, and not by a forcible tool such as the physical, heteronomous methods of imposition by law and governing power. Such an approach contravenes the ILO Constitution. Therefore, we, the democratic trade unions, have jointly submitted a complaint to the ILO against the Government of Korea.

The democratic trade unions and the Federation of Korean Trade Unions cannot become one trade union. The biggest reason is suspicion that the activities of the Federation of Korean Trade Unions are too involved with the Government and with capital. After last year, the Federation of Korean Trade Unions and the employers unilaterally fixed the rate of wage increases for this year in the name of social consensus. That is preposterous. The rate of wage increase never matched the increases in prices. Nevertheless, the Federation of Korean Trade Unions demands that the workers obey it. I agree with social consensus, but I simply oppose imaginary social consensuses that ignore democratic procedures and the principle of equity. ...

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. MATINCHEV) – You have started attacking Korea and we feel that this is unacceptable. We remind you that you should keep to the item on the agenda which is the subject of our debate, namely the Report of the Director-General.

Mr. SUK-BUM – I would like to make a serious appeal. There are about 3,600 workers imprisoned or dismissed for trade union activities under the past authoritarian regime in Korea. The new Government promised to reinstate them; no action has yet been taken. The workers have had hunger strikes lasting 38 days last year and 28 days this year. Among the dismissed, some have died of disease and the family members of others have even committed suicide because of the shock of their dismissal. I hope this session will be of historical significance, and that we will make a more concerned effort to fulfil the goals of the ILO than any other session. I hope some day to report the good news about the resolution of all labour problems in Korea.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. MATINCHEV) – I give the floor to Mr. Yantais, Government adviser, Greece, who would like to exercise his right of reply to a statement made on 7 June 1994 by Mr. Sabriu, Minister of Labour and Social Policy of the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

Mr. YANTAIS (Government adviser, Greece) – On 7 June, at the third sitting of the Conference, the Minister of Labour of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, although not originally scheduled, participated in the debate. Having seen the text of his intervention in the Provisional Record, I wish to make use of my right of reply.

This regards, on the one hand, the incorrect denomination of the State in question, used in that statement. May I remind the Conference of Security Council Resolution 817 of 1993, according to which that State has been admitted to the United Nations "being provisionally referred to for all purposes within the United Nations as the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, pending settlement of the difference that has arisen over the name of that State". The difference has not yet been settled.

On the other hand, a blockade imposed by Greece was mentioned as the cause of increased unemployment in that country. This cause and effect linkage is hard to imagine, let alone to evaluate over a four-month period. The measure mentioned was taken only in mid-February.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. MATINCHEV) – I give the floor to Mr. Freeman, Government delegate, United States, who wishes to exercise his right of reply to the statement made this morning by Mr. Linares Calvo, Minister of Labour and Social Security, Cuba.

Mr. FREEMAN (Government delegate, United States) – The economic sanctions to which the Cuban delegate alluded originated from a resolution of the Organization of American States in response to the regrettable lack of democracy and freedom which has prevailed in that country for 33 years and which have caused hundreds of thousands – no, I would say millions – of freedom-loving Cubans to flee that country and to seek asylum in my country and other countries of the western hemisphere.

Tenth sitting

Monday, 13 June 1994, 10 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Gray, Mr. Ould Sidi

FIRST REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the first report of the Credentials Committee.

I give the floor to Mr. Spencer, Government delegate, Trinidad and Tobago, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to submit the Committee's first report to the Conference.

Mr. SPENCER (Government delegate, Trinidad and Tobago; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour today to present the first report of the Credentials Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 8.

The report sets out the position with regard to the composition of the Conference, as well as the quorum, as it was on 10 June when it was adopted by the Committee.

In the meantime, Armenia has accredited a tripartite delegation, bringing the number of member States present at the Conference to 158.

The report also contains a table setting out the statistical data of the delegations which had registered when the Committee's report was adopted. In this regard, I wish to draw attention to an error in the tables in the French and Spanish versions of the Provisional Record. While the final figures are correct, there are errors in the data for some countries. A corrigendum will appear in Provisional Record No. 10 rectifying the errors in those two versions. The English version of the Provisional Record is correct.

This year no countries nominated a Workers' delegate without also nominating an Employers' delegate, or vice versa. But six countries have sent exclusively governmental delegations. The report reminds governments of their obligation to comply with article 3 of the Constitution, which requires that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference, and urges them, when nominating delegations, to have due regard for an appropriate proportion in the tripartite composition of the Conference, as envisaged in the Constitution.

The Committee also reminds member States of their obligation to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers, and trusts that this obligation will be respected for the entire duration of this session of the Conference.

I should also like draw your attention to the information contained in paragraph 7 of the report concerning the number of women among the accredited delegates and advisers further to the resolution adopted by the Conference in 1981.

The Committee was pleased to note that this year many more governments have submitted credentials within the time-limit laid down in the Standing Orders than in the past, and wishes to encourage governments to do so as it serves to facilitate the work of the Office. It is particularly important that governments provide precise information on the employers' and workers' organizations consulted concerning the appointment of delegates and advisers, as well as information on the organizations which have agreed to such appointments.

As this report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee, the Conference is required only to take note of it.

The PRESIDENT – As Mr. Spencer has just noted, this report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee and therefore I invite the Conference simply to take note of it. I would like to thank the Chairman and the Officers of the Committee for the excellent report that they have just presented to us.

(The report is noted.)

The PRESIDENT – We will now resume our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. KROSS (Minister of Labour, Suriname) – It is a great honour for me to congratulate the President on behalf of my delegation, on his election to preside over this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that under his expert guidance, in close cooperation with the other appointed delegates, our deliberations will be brought to a successful end.

May I take this opportunity to extend the congratulations and greetings of the people of the Republic of Suriname and my Government to the International Labour Organization on the memorable occasion of its 75th anniversary, as well as the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia and the 25th anniversary of the ILO Caribbean Office. We are proud to be part of this Organization as it still stands above all as one of the oldest international organizations dedicated to the ideal of promoting social justice in the world.

Furthermore I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General on his Report which is of timely importance. This annual meeting offers us ample opportunity to reflect upon the many changes and challenges in today's world, as indicated in the Director-General's Report. In this framework, it should be noted that the Director-General has given full attention to today's values in promoting change and to the role of the ILO in international policy-making.

The principles and ideals of the ILO as laid down in its Constitution contribute to universal and lasting peace through the promotion and development of social justice. My Government is convinced that these ideals can only be realized on the basis of the fundamental principles of democratic societies. It is in this regard that my Government certainly gives wholehearted support to the principles and ideals of peace, security and democracy. We are convinced that only democratic principles can create the conditions for healthy and well-balanced social and economic development in all our countries. We hereby reaffirm our commitment to alleviate poverty and guarantee basic human rights.

However, owing to the globalization of the economic crisis and other external and internal factors, my country and my Government are now facing a crucial phase in the implementation of a structural adjustment programme. While looking for adequate solutions to overcome the adverse effects of the economic crisis, we have also become aware that our young and fragile democracy could be threatened by possible social eruptions as a result of the adjustment process.

At the same time, mention can be made of the fact that traditionally there are free and independent employers' and workers' organizations in my country. They now have to prepare themselves to play an effective role in the economic and social development of the country during the structural adjustment process.

We share the view of the founders of the ILO that the promotion of social justice in the field of labour can be achieved only if the social partners themselves are involved in seeking appropriate solutions, and that dialogue and negotiations between the social partners should be based on joint consultation and tripartism.

Aware of the need to reach consensus on the policy to overcome the current crisis, my Government very recently established a tripartite consultation mechanism at the national level. This institutional arrangement should be seen as an initiative on the part of the Government to arrive at policies on remuneration, employment and investment. Moreover, there is the labour advisory council which advises the Minister of Labour on matters relating to labour and employment issues.

Talking about the issue of laws brings us to the discussion on a review of the standard-setting activities of the ILO, as suggested in the Report by the Director-General. In view of the changing world and the creation of new conditions and new challenges we indeed share the opinion of the Director-General in questioning the relevance, effectiveness and suitability of the legislative function of our Organization. We agree with the recommended procedure to create new opportunities for standard setting, as long as it does not cause a weakening of the available social protection mechanism. In this respect, the need for standard setting and a better utilization of the available instruments are still imperative.

Hence, it is of great pleasure to me that, especially on the occasion of the ILO's 75th anniversary and being present at this session of the Conference, I am given the opportunity to inform you of the preliminary activities undertaken by my Government in order to arrive at the ratification of the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154) later this year. In so doing, we are aware that we have committed ourselves to incorporating the provisions of these instruments in our national law and practice. This standard-setting action should be seen in the light of our contribution to social progress as an achievement of the ILO's objectives in order to improve the conditions of work at the workplace.

In strengthening the international effectiveness of standard-setting action, the Director-General has suggested in his Report that a link should be made between international labour standards and international trade. Especially in the world of today, owing to the globalization of the economy, the effectiveness of ILO standards as regulators of international trade is of significant importance to the world. The development of a global market-place creates new trading blocks which have far-reaching implications for the working people. Countries in the global market-place are looking worldwide for skilled labour and low-cost support services for knowledge-intensive industries, and we developing countries have to question whether we are interested or not in attracting them to our countries in the Third World. The emphasis on export, while it does create greater employment opportunities in industries such as electronic assembly and data entry, results in conditions of employment which make the available jobs temporary, low paid and precarious.

Reference made by the Director-General to the social clause in the context of the globalization of the economy, should indeed guarantee in international trade agreements that the liberalization of markets is accompanied by the elimination of exploitation and abuse at the workplace. This should be accomplished through persuasion and cooperation rather than coercion, building upon the voluntary commitment to social progress that is inherent to membership of the Organization. In this respect, we expect that the ILO will be prepared to deal effectively with all these subjects.

According to the Director-General's Report, the ILO has, in addition to the standard-setting activity, another essential function. This is the extension of technical assistance to its Members in dealing with issues of labour and development. My Government is convinced that the ILO has an important role to play in activities such as technical cooperation, advisory services and policy guidance. With the new approach of working in regional multidisciplinary teams, we hope that the wide range of services will be more integrated for the benefit of its constituents. We also stress and reaffirm more flexibility and changes of style, methods and procedures which will enhance the quality, relevance and practical utility of ILO technical programmes.

When we take into consideration flexibility and change, it implies that there is also a need to talk about modernization and streamlining the information and ideas which are of major concern for governments and social partners. We firmly endorse the Director-General's proposal to use the ILO as a forum for debate, offering opportunities for exchanging and sharing views and experiences as well as through regional and subregional meetings.

Finally, with respect to South Africa, I would like to extend the congratulations of the people of Suriname and my Government to the people of South Africa and its leaders on their successful struggle against apartheid. In the light of global democracy, this success could be seen as a victory for the whole world.

Original Spanish: Mr. CUSTER (representative, World Confederation of Labour) – Mr. President, in congratulating you on your election we would like to stress the importance of the fact that this session of the International Labour Conference has elected a Workers' representative to the chair, and we wish you every success.

We cannot fail to refer to the 75th anniversary of the ILO. Our association – World Confederation of Labour, which was founded virtually at the same time as the ILO, is also celebrating its almost 75 years of cooperation between the two organizations, and we repeat our hope and our commitment for joint efforts at the service of the fundamental objective of both institutions which is to serve and promote social justice throughout the world.

During this special celebration the presence of South Africa with a tripartite, multiracial delegation coming from a democratic country is perhaps the very best gift that could be given to the ILO and we reiterate our full and permanent solidarity with the workers of South Africa for the rebuilding of their country.

Despite these positive facts we must recall with great regret the tragedies that are affecting the people of Rwanda, Bosnia, Angola, Haiti and Yemen. The very serious situation of the workers in Palestine, and the continuing serious violations of human rights and trade union freedoms are to a large extent the responsibility of some of the member States of the United Nations and of the ILO.

The Report of the Director-General is an attempt to put forward important questions in order to stimulate serious debate. Although we do not share all of the assessments of the Report, we do fully share the main objective which is to seek ways to bring about the development of social justice. We feel this is a very useful Report that will be further complemented by the contributions of the Conference itself and other more dynamic work by the Governing Body.

At the end of 1993 our association held its 23rd Congress in Mauritius and the central topic for debate and that of the main resolution was precisely the urgent need to design and build an alternative world order. We believe that this should be the main subject of our concerns, and in particular should determine the role to be played by the ILO in view of the serious challenges that we face now and in the future.

As was indicated from this same podium by the Secretary-General of the United Nations Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, "we have the task of reinventing a new mode of life in our societies, ... we must lay down a new social pact for the whole world". The President of the European Union Mr. Jacques Delors also recently said that we need to create bodies for economic coordination and rationality, despite those who quite wrongly believe that the market and free-reined competition alone can generate growth and development. Therefore, we consider that flexibility, deregulation, reduction of social protection and the cheapening of social costs are serious contradictions of the underlying concepts of the ILO and its objectives to promote human progress and social justice.

Distinguished economists – among them the very prestigious Professor John Kenneth Galbraith – have indicated that the liberal model which attempts are currently being made to impose globally is not only unjust, but will lead us to a downward spiral in social terms and to a recessionary spiral in economic terms, because given the increase in unemployment, poverty and marginality, the main objective is to increase demand and consumption; to establish minimally equitable relations in international trade; and to seek a development model with rational distribution that takes into account important social and ecological factors. The workers agree with the need for an efficient economy, the importance of the market and legitimate competition; but these are merely partial instruments that need to be integrated into a global development concept.

In his Report the Director-General speaks of the uneven distribution of international GNP where 20 per cent of the world population holds 83 per cent of wealth, and 80 per cent of the population – more than three-quarters of all humanity – participates in only 17 per cent of this wealth. This enormous inequality between the developed countries and the poor countries is truly a scandal, which together with growing unemployment in the wealthy countries reveals the dualism of the economic model; there is a subsequent increase in marginality and poverty, which is indeed a danger for democracy and peace.

We therefore denounce this economic, irrational and backward liberal model, which is also leaving its mark in the enormous injustices in North-South relations.

We are thus amazed at the recent conclusions of the Ministers of the OECD, whose labour ministry colleagues are present here at this Conference, when they insisted that attempts to reduce unemployment should be based on an anti-social policy of flexibility and labour deregulation, by reducing wages and social protection. It is quite regrettable that at this level there is no talk at all of redistribution of wealth (as was indicated here by the Secretary-General of the United Nations), even as a means of making the economy more dynamic, and that in global terms no attention is given to the increase in poverty and marginality; to the inequalities in international trade (which are increasing as a result of the devaluation of raw materials and protectionism in the developed countries); to the ravages caused to Third World countries, by the external debt, which together with international financial speculation and lack of any curbs on capital constitutes a situation which has now come to alarm even the International Monetary Fund.

The recent report of the UNDP (the United Nations Development Programme) confirms our analysis and indicates that worldwide military spending still represents the sum of the income of half of humanity. It is regrettable that the Finance Ministers of the wealthy countries insist on a suicidal policy of impoverishment and marginality, paid for by the workers and the poorest sectors; instead of attacking the very roots of injustice and current economic irrationality, dealing only with their dramatic consequences.

It is here that the ILO had a dynamic and innovative role to play. We believe first and foremost in the essential need for the support of the ILO to the United Nations, and its interaction with international economic and financial bodies. In this sense the statement made by the Secretary-General of the United Nations at this session of the Conference constitutes considerable support for such action. We would like to reiterate our full support for the document on The ILO towards the twenty-first century which was submitted by the Workers' group, with the support of the international trade union organizations. We would recall the "Resolution on the ILO" taken at the 23rd Congress of the WCL, both of which are specific proposals which I will not go into further.

We rigorously defend the need for international social legislation, which is essential in a globalized economy. In this respect, the ILO standards are fundamental and we also believe that the social clauses are very important, as part of well-defined criteria that will prevent any protectionist use, and with proper guarantees of multilateralism and objectivity, and here there is an essential role to be played by the ILO in developing appropriate mechanisms. Together with other organizations, such as the ICFTU and the European Trade Union Confederation we uphold this as a very useful instrument for social justice and international solidarity.

We also believe that the World Summit for Social Development is an important opportunity so that at the very highest level and with the appropriate preparation, the international community may deal with these serious challenges in order to achieve a model of sustained, rational, shared human development. The ILO has an important role to play at this Summit, and we believe that it is the most suitable and appropriate Organization in that its fundamental responsibility will be recognized in regard to the application of recommendations and the programme of action which will be drawn up by the World Summit for Social Development.

As workers we are also particularly interested in the Summit and we shall make every effort, requesting the member States of the ILO to mobilize participation in all of their countries of the social forces, with the participation of the trade unions in particular, to contribute to the preparatory work of the Summit at the national and regional levels.

As we said, the World Confederation of Labour (WCL) will have its 75th anniversary next year, and it reiterates its support for the ILO and its firm conviction in the strengthening of its work and its fundamental objectives: promoting human progress, harmony among peoples, and social justice.

Original French: Mr. FRISO (General Secretary, International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) – I would like first of all to congratulate most sincerely the President of this session on his election. No one will be astonished if as General Secretary of the ICFTU I am proud to see this important session chaired by a Workers' delegate.

The International Labour Organization is this year celebrating its 75th anniversary, and since its creation has become a true world labour parliament. During its 75 years of existence, the ILO has been able, through international tripartism, to establish a reference code which has provided the social partners with true legal instruments helping to promote consultation and social dialogue and therefore improve the lot of millions of human beings.

The ILO, in its time, has faced many challenges. Some people have tried to weaken its supervisory mechanisms, to cast doubt on the scope of its instruments, and to marginalize it in terms of other specialized agencies of the United Nations, of which it is, let us not forget, the senior member. The ILO has always risen to meet the challenges.

Even though we must acknowledge that much remains to be done, the numerous successes of the Organization in the pursuit of its mission are, I think, due to its loyalty to the principles on which it was created, and, I must stress, undoubtedly to the vigilance of the Workers' group and the trade union movement as a whole.

Today, the trade unions expect from the ILO the same tenacity to resist the pressures of those sectors which seem to be ready to sacrifice the very essence of the mission of the Organization in the name of what they call flexibility or deregulation. At a time when one-fifth of the population of the world lives in extreme poverty, with only the equivalent of one dollar a day to survive on, when 800 million workers throughout the world, a third of the economically active population of the world, are unemployed, when tens of millions of children are exploited shamefully, carrying out dangerous work in deplorable conditions, can we decently propose that the ILO's standard-setting activity be scaled down?

Will we create employment through measures making it easier to lay off staff?

Will we promote justice by reducing the scope of social protection?

Will we kick-start the world economy by reducing the influence of those who are responsible for negotiating improvements to conditions of work and whose activities will help create additional markets by assuring that populations can wield their purchasing power?

These are the questions we should be considering during the anniversary, we who are concerned about the future of this Organization. These questions are, I am pleased to see, referred to in the Report presented by the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne.

Despite the scenario I have just described, the ICFTU remains convinced that the ILO has a leading role to play in a global initiative, devised at the international level, to combat poverty and unemployment.

We are equally convinced that this role can be played effectively only by focusing on the implementation of international labour standards. And we should not deceive ourselves, this is in the interests of countries of both the south and the north. Because, I stress, by contributing to the improvement of the situation of the two-thirds of the inhabitants of our planet, providing them with the means to defend their interests, to increase their purchasing power and benefit from the fruits of their labour and investment, whilst respecting the traditions, customs and different cultures that enrich the world, we are helping to kick-start the world economy.

Therefore, the standard-setting activity of the ILO must continue. The fate of millions of people and the Organization's credibility depend on it. For that reason the ICFTU now calls for the inclusion of basic ILO standards in a social charter at the world level, backed up by new supervisory mechanisms.

On the eve of the creation of the World Trade Organization the ILO must work actively for the inclusion of a social clause in international trade agreements.

In this regard my organization has formulated concrete proposals on the contents of the clause and how to implement it. For those still not convinced, I must stress that for the trade unions, the social clause is, and must remain, an anti-protectionist measure. I think that we have been very clear on this subject.

Firstly, the clause should be used to promote investment in developing countries and therein create for the investors a favourable climate for development and for the local population a just distribution of the fruits of investment. This can be done quite simply through the respect of the right of workers to create trade unions and the rights of the trade unions to negotiate with the employers, on the basis of national criteria for conditions of work.

Secondly, it would allow gradually, taking into account the local situation, to increase the purchasing power of the workers throughout the world and thus satisfy their essential needs, and also allow them to create markets for local consumption and, as a result, to increase overall demand, attract new investment and boost employment.

Thirdly, a multilateral approach involving the ILO will finally put a stop to unilateral protectionist measures which some countries would try to impose to monopolize a share of markets.

No one has ever challenged the role of the ILO in defining labour standards and the means of supervising their implementation. It is part of its mission. It is therefore essential, even natural, that it act now in conjunction with the World Trade Organization.

Mr. Hansenne quite rightly stresses the need to increase the influence of the ILO. This is certainly the case with regard to the Bretton Woods institutions and structural adjustment programmes. It is not by chance that in many countries these programmes have been shelved because their social effects were simply disastrous.

The impending World Summit for Social Development will help to test the political will of the governments in this regard. It is quite evident that the agenda of the Summit corresponds perfectly with the mandate of the ILO, as it will discuss issues such as poverty, employment and social exclusion. It is equally evident that if we want the Summit to have any impact on these burning issues, we must begin now to solicit the participation of the social actors in its preparation.

We must also ensure that the rich countries, whose governments are party to the decisions of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank go beyond, in Copenhagen, merely mentioning the extent of social damage inflicted. They will have to give a firm commitment, along with the international financial institutions, to take effective and coordinated measures at the world level to solve the problems.

In conclusion, I would like once again to impress upon all the groups here the importance of the foundations of this Organization, namely tripartism, consultation and dialogue. They are not only important here at Geneva, once a year, for three weeks, but a daily necessity in every country.

There can be no real democracy without tripartism, and there can be no tripartism without real democracy. Because true tripartism is when every partner, confident of its autonomy and independence, can express itself freely in the defence of the interests of those it represents.

It is evident that the task before the ILO on the threshold of the twenty-first century will require some decisive work. But, we must all sign up to help. At any rate, the ICFTU is ready to play its part in the fray.

Original Spanish: Mr. BELTRÁN VALLEJO (Workers' delegate, Venezuela) – On behalf of the delegation of the workers of Venezuela, we warmly congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election. We are happy to note that for the second time in the Organisation's 75-year history a representative of the workers is presiding over the Conference. We are convinced that the election of Brother Charles Gray, International Director of our sister organization the AFL-CIO, is an expression of the will of the majority of the Members that the ILO should remain in the vanguard of international social law and that the internal changes in the Organization should be directed towards achieving that end.

I shall begin by presenting an economic and social overview of the situation in Venezuela. The crisis triggered by foreign debt and the implementation of neo-liberal policies, unemployment, spiralling inflation, alarming levels of poverty, with two-thirds of the population living in poverty and one-third of the latter in critical poverty, the trend towards greater flexibility and deregulation of labour standards, an inoperative social security institution are only some of the phenomena that are seriously undermining the quality of life and working conditions of our members.

The Venezuelan trade union sector is doing its best to coordinate efforts to alleviate the impact of the changes in our economy, but we cannot continue to be the only ones making sacrifices which jeopardize our social and economic gains and the social security system that provides the only guarantee of protection for our workers. Justice and equity require that those who have more should make greater sacrifices.

It should be borne in mind that unemployment and poverty are social tragedies that give rise to civil war – we have proof of that fact in our own region. The injustice and inequity in which Venezuelans live have created tensions that muddy the political atmosphere.

Democracy depends to a crucial extent on the universal application of international standards relating to trade union and workers' rights of the workers, such as those adopted within the ILO, since they guarantee the genuine exercise of human rights.

We would like to say that in Venezuela, as a result of the crisis and the application of distorted models, the informal sector of the economy has grown considerably. This indicator should not be taken as a pretext for calling into question the representative legitimacy of our trade union organizations, which have the necessary structure for organizing informal workers and protecting their interests.

We, the workers of Venezuela, have no alternative but to denounce the violation of our trade union rights as laid down in national and international instruments, particularly in the international labour Conventions on freedom of association and the right to organize, Nos. 87 and 98, ratified by Venezuela.

The introduction by the Venezuelan Congress of a so-called "Bill to protect the exercise of internal democracy in trade unions, federations and confederations", which contains provisions in flagrant breach of, inter alia, the right of trade union organizations to draft their statutes and elect their representatives freely, is further proof of a recent trend towards action designed to weaken the Venezuelan trade union movement for the benefit of other sectors.

But this is not an isolated phenomenon. Internationally, we have seen the pursuit of strategies aimed at destabilizing the trade union sector and even calling into question the tripartism of the ILO. There is no doubt, as the Director-General says in his Report, that social change is seriously undermining the foundations of our organizations and, in particular, of the ILO.

We stand firm in our view that the tripartite system is the appropriate instrument for adapting ourselves to the changes taking place in prevailing political, economic and social circumstances.

We do not share the Director-General's view that the standard-setting activities of the ILO should be reformulated or reorientated – no, not on any pretext. It is an illusion to suppose that the development of our countries depends on introducing flexibility and deregulating labour standards. On the contrary, we workers, confident that universal standards introduce equity into our working conditions, are committed to cooperating with a view to raising the slow and stagnant rate of ratification of international Conventions.

Of course we support what the Report says regarding the impossibility of reverting to the law of the jungle. The trade union movement represented in the ILO will also oppose the establishment of "framework Conventions" supplemented by a list of Recommendations or guidelines since this would simply result in a loss of the binding nature of international standards.

There should be a commitment to fulfilment by governments, employers and workers of their duties as laid down in the ILO Constitution.

Turning to other points in the Report, we must say that we feel deep concern at the obstacles that are preventing the ILO from carrying out its work at the present time. As on other occasions, the Organization will have to take vigorous action to address the current difficulties. The conviction that the ILO's basic mandate is more relevant than ever must be converted into a driving force that adds momentum to the quest for social justice.

We would like to emphasize that our trade union organizations are accustomed to overcoming the obstacles that we have encountered since our establishment in seeking to defend the interests of the workers. The unity and strength of workers in their efforts to achieve a higher standard of living and better working conditions under circumstances such as those now prevailing give us courage to defend this Organization, which we see as our own.

We reject the demand that other social act should be brought into the ILO structure with a vi to diminishing or reducing tripartism.

We welcome the launching of the active partn ship policy and the creation of multidisciplina teams in the region as a means of bringing the IL closer to its constituents. However, it should pointed out that this policy will not succeed unless takes into account the interests and the proposals the workers and adopts a tripartite approach to t problems of labour. We take this opportunity to co mend the important work being done by the ILO f workers through the Bureau for Workers Activiti and the Workers' Education Programme.

We urge the ILO, in its 75th anniversary year, maintain its basic mandate of promoting social ju tice through the strengthening of the rights of t workers and the improvement of their working co ditions and to offer stout resistance to any attem to divert it from its basic mission.

We appeal to governments and representatives organizations that negotiate trade privileges to esta lish a social clause providing for respect for the ba workers' rights laid down in the Conventions working hours, protection of wages, social poli forced labour, non-discrimination, freedom of asso ation and others.

The Director-General is right when he says th the changes sweeping through our societies – a pro uct of the liberalization of international trade a the globalization of production and markets – a now beyond the control of national authorities. F that reason, the International Labour Organizati must fully discharge its constitutional mandate of e amining and considering "all international econom or financial policies and measures".

The Workers recommend to the ILO that it ta action to overcome the obstacles facing the Org nization, strengthen the research programmes, ca out an analysis of the repercussions of econom changes on the world of work and of their social i pact, and put forward concrete policies to be imp mented both nationally and internationally. Th should be the new mission of the International L bour Organization.

Finally, we Venezuelan workers urge the ILO bring its influence to bear on the International Mo etary Fund and the World Bank so that the process of economic restructuring may be given a social mension. The ILO should also take advantage of t opportunity offered by the World Summit for Soc Development in 1995 to play a fundamental role the discussions there and to enhance the tripart approach.

We reiterate our congratulations to Brother Gr and trust that his conduct of the proceedings will

Original Portuguese: Mr. PIMENTEL (Minister
State of Labour, Brazil) – It is a great privilege me to take part in the International Labour Conf ence marking the 75th anniversary of the creation the ILO. Speaking on behalf of the Brazil Government I should like to congratulate Mr. Gr on his election as President of the Conference a extend as well my congratulations to the Direct General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, with sincerest wishes for every success in their many i portant tasks.

On behalf of the Brazilian Government it is with great satisfaction that I witness South Africa's reintegration into the ILO and I congratulate the South African people on their success in their fight against apartheid and democratization of the country. I would also like to take this opportunity to welcome all of the new member States.

I would like to begin by expressing my congratulations to the Director-General on his Report and the treatment it gives to the questions of strengthening international standards in view of globalization of the economy. I was particularly impressed by the emphasis placed on the so-called "social clause" in international agreements recommending the adoption of social and political sanctions rather than commercial or economic ones.

Acknowledging the need to expand the scope of international rules, I applaud the strict position adopted against any intent to mandate equalization of social costs among nations. The ILO is based on the principle of cooperation, not coercion.

I praise the argument against the equalization of labour costs through regulation. Bearing in mind the political and social processes of each nation, a better approach would be to verify to what degree States are considering the possibility of ratifying and/or applying international standards in a manner compatible with their situation and means, and especially in relation to the degree of economic growth achieved as a result of liberalization of trade.

Brazil supports the statement contained in the Director-General's Report urging developed countries to promote more equitable economic and social conditions through enhanced international cooperation.

Regarding, however, the participation of representative organizations in internal decision-making processes, if such a recommendation was intended to include the entire domestic political processes of nations, it would imply a political concept of the State and of social organization which, in my view, exceeds the ILO's mandate.

I note that the political participation of workers as a "class" is becoming stronger even in my country, but I believe this is still quite far from justifying the adoption of a doctrine or a complete political model at an international level. We have no problem in this regard as we have always respected the principle of agreement in achieving final objectives.

The Report of the Director-General will surely have important implications for our nations. It is a daring initiative in its approach to the globalization of the economy and to the heightened struggle for markets and competition which will create new needs for international understanding regarding the degree to which the labour factor can be affected by such new and overwhelming competition.

In fact, the gap between the poor and the rich is becoming unacceptably large at a time when there is so much progress. We all believe that the world owes many of its inhabitants minimum living standards and dignity. However, the statistics on poverty and disease are so high that no one knows how to assist those who are suffering.

The ILO must play an important role during the World Summit for Social Development. It should thereby strengthen its role as promoter of workers' rights and the fundamental freedoms of the world of labour. The ILO must develop conditions to promote strong international cooperation between member States to assist those in greater difficulties to implement better working conditions.

A few years ago, Brazil experienced intermittent economic development with periods of stagnation, with economic "shocks" and the State intervening in various ways in the economy.

Many of those who visit our country are impressed by the development of some sectors of the economy, while others note the prevalence of high inflation rates and low wages. Critical remarks range from social discrimination to forced labour, emphasizing the unfair distribution of national income.

Inflation today is under control to a certain extent and it is expected that the new currency, the real, which will be adopted as of 1 July, together with important fiscal measures, will ensure the stability which the expanding Brazilian economy needs to forge ahead, free from the fear of constant innovations in legal and monetary conditions.

In the labour scenario, unemployment and underemployment have become chronic evils, whereas wages give rise to constant collective labour disputes. Development programmes are being studied and we believe that as inflation begins to fall progress will be resumed.

I am sure many of those who have spoken before me have expressed great confidence in the future, which I do not hesitate to repeat because we are a people who are constantly seeking progress despite the many unfavourable political and economic situations that we have experienced.

To put it briefly, I would like to say that we are fighting against discrimination of all kinds, particularly the sporadic acts of violence against workers caused by markedly different educational and family income levels.

We are quite far from being a country where forced labour prevails. All of the accusations that have been made in this respect are being strictly investigated and police investigations are being carried out and criminal actions filed whenever matters of this kind are brought before the authorities. However, it would be frivolous to say that there are no criminals of any kind in our country.

The child labour phenomenon is even more typical in less culturally adapted regions. A recent study carried out by an American professor for more than ten years on the causes of enhanced demographic growth in various regions of the world shows that education and economic development are much more effective in reducing population growth than birth control.

This is so for a reason that has been amply demonstrated, very much connected to the issue of child labour: the large number of children is part of subsistence planning by low-income families by which they promote the early entry of their under-age children into the labour market.

These comments are not being made to justify inertia but rather to illustrate the degree of difficulty that we face in attempting to prevent child labour within the family without a programme for re-education and economic progress.

We are making every effort to provide vocational training for Brazilian workers in order for them to always be qualified for jobs. Most of the countries represented here know the work carried out by our national apprentice system. We are responsive to the contemporary need for updating the skills of our workers so that new jobs when they are created will find new workers, that is workers who are constantly being trained.

But the generation of employment is crucial in this effort, without which all of our efforts would be merely begging the question. This is not a task to be carried out by the State alone, although many of the necessary incentives must come from the State, particularly those provided to small enterprises which are creating more jobs than any other sector. At present we are studying a national employment and income plan.

We are not simply taking refuge in generalities but rather trying to show that, given our geographic dimensions and huge cultural variations, our deficiencies are not to be blamed on the Brazilian nation as if it had the means to correct these social and economic problems and were simply refusing to do so through negligence or cruelty.

We are also taking measures to simplify our legal system, particularly the procedural system, so that the labour courts may more speedily decide on matters brought before them.

We know that our labour courts are among the most active in the world and are constantly incorporating more judges and courts. We are not saying this to brag, but we can hardly overlook the fact that in the last five-year period they have judged, on the average, 1,383,697 cases.

We are aware that this figure, on the one hand, reveals a high degree of dissatisfaction with individual and collective labour relations and that, on the other, it shows that our judiciary system is overloaded. Our system needs to be simplified, and this is what we expect the National Congress to do before this year is over.

The President of the Republic intends to encourage collective bargaining so that it can play a leading role in the solution of conflicts between capital and labour.

Brazil is assuming its responsibilities to its people and the nations of the world. It does not hide the truth, nor does it overemphasize its merits. It continues to hope and work hard to overcome the difficulties that stand in the way of its progress.

We thank the ILO for the excellent work that it is doing, inviting and urging us to improve labour relations throughout the world. We are here to acknowledge our mistakes, but also to ask for understanding and goodwill towards our efforts.

Original Arabic: Mr. ELAMAWY (Minister of Manpower and Employment, Egypt) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. I have pleasure in congratulating the President on his election to chair this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference which coincides with the 75th anniversary of our Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. Our best wishes to him and to all the Officers for success in conducting the proceedings of this session.

We have read with great interest the Report of the Director-General entitled Defending values, promoting change. It is an in-depth analysis of the activities and principles of the ILO in the light of the major changes occurring in the world and of how best to develop the Organization to bring it into line with these changes. The Report contains specific proposals for extensive discussion at this Conference. We, for our part, will seek to participate in the dialogue on the proposals in the light of Egyptian experience and our view of recent international changes. There have indeed been radical and far-reaching changes since the last decade, foremost among them the fall of the Berlin wall, the transformation of the socialist States of Eastern Europe, the consolidation of the world trend towards democracy and market economies with their associated mechanisms, and the end of the Uruguay multilateral round of trade negotiations which gave birth to the World Trade Organization and laid the basis for increased liberalization of international trade. All of this has had a positive impact on social justice, which is the goal that our Organization has been pursuing since its inception.

The most recent development was the end of apartheid and racial discrimination in South Africa, through the holding of free elections, the consolidation of democracy and the election of President Nelson Mandela as President of the Republic. We would like to congratulate South Africa, its President, its Government and its people on these constructive developments, and Egypt welcomes and supports the return of South Africa to the ILO with tripartite representation – government, workers and employers.

We also welcome the Sultanate of Oman and the Republic of Tajikistan as new Members of our Organization.

Egypt appreciates the role of the Organization in setting standards and cooperates with it as fully as possible in the pursuit of its aims. Suffice it to note that Egypt has to date ratified 60 international Conventions within the framework of the ILO. In this connection, we wish to mention the fact that we have faced tremendous difficulties in fully implementing those Conventions inasmuch as a number of them were drawn up many years ago and are highly complex and detailed. Although we try as best we can to implement them, we feel that the time has come to update some international Conventions and Recommendations to bring them into line with international developments. The Conventions should contain broad general principles and the details should be left for the Recommendations. Were this to be decided, it would rationalize the Organization's strategy aimed at adjusting to the new world circumstances. We believe that flexible international standard-setting will enable States to ratify and implement these standards, ending the present stagnation in ratification. In this way, one of the main objectives of the Organization – improving working conditions, raising productivity and protecting human resources – can be achieved.

The Director-General said in his Report that we should everywhere encourage social dialogue, collective bargaining and, in particular, compromise solutions. Governments have an important role to play in the success of this social dialogue. The reorganization of the administrative structure of the State will help individual States to play their proper role in the face of the current changes.

In this connection, we should like to point out that last year in Egypt we began to reorganize governmental and administrative structures responsible for dealing with labour and workers' problems. The Ministry of Labour and Employment now has broader and more detailed responsibilities in addressing such problems. It works in coordination with intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to reduce unemployment in Egypt. As the Director-General said in his Report, unemployment is one of the most serious problems facing the world today, in both developing and developed countries.

The training of a productive work force has become one of the main responsibilities of policy-makers but the trend towards globalization of the economy has reduced the ability of national governments to control economic policy instruments that have a major impact, in terms of both quantity and quality, on the labour force and even on national policies aimed at achieving social progress.

In the face of the globalization of the economy, the ILO should not confine itself to standard-setting activities but should play a prominent role in increasing job opportunities, alleviating poverty and solving the problems confronting workers in all countries.

The Organization must play a more effective role in eradicating the various forms of exploitation of labour which unfortunately persist up to the present time. Suffice it to mention two basic problems to which the ILO should give absolute priority, namely child labour and equal treatment for immigrant workers and workers who are nationals of the country concerned. We believe that these are two of the most serious problems at present confronting developing countries and that they are key components of the ILO's mandate.

In Egypt we are prepared to host and support an integrated programme for the abolition of child labour in Africa, and we should be pleased to have its headquarters in Cairo.

With regard to the World Summit for Social Development to be held in Copenhagen in 1995, all United Nations bodies and specialized agencies are actively preparing for the event. We consider it vitally important for the ILO to engage in active preparations, especially since our Organization is unique in terms of its tripartite representation and its concern for the social dimension of development. We therefore trust that the results of the Summit will constitute a relevant response to the challenges to be addressed by the international community in the twenty-first century.

Having taken note of the report by the Secretary-General of the United Nations entitled An agenda for development, we consider it important that it should be included among the official documents of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference so that we can take it into consideration in our discussions and in the resolutions adopted by this Conference so that the Governing Body may take them into account at its future sessions.

We are against any confusion of roles in the form of encroachment by another body on our Organization's mandate and we therefore reject demands coming from some quarters for the establishment of a relationship between international trade and international labour standards. While we agree with the Director-General's view that the ILO's role must be based on two basic rules that it has observed since its inception, namely the voluntary nature of a State's commitment to abide by international conventions and the fact that the commitments resulting from conventions directly concern the State that has ratified them, we consider that the implementation of these two rules calls for the separation of action to liberalize world trade from action to secure respect for labour standards and social protection. We cannot allow the question of labour standards to be used as a pretext by some advanced countries for introducing protective and restrictive measures in a disguised form in order to limit access to international markets for the products of developing countries on the grounds of "social dumping". This is why we reject the compulsory equalization of social costs in different countries because it is not the ILO's responsibility to organize world trade but that of the World Trade Organization, whose establishment was decided at the Uruguay Round. However, we support the provision of assistance to countries to encourage them to implement standards that are vital for social progress and also the provision of effective support, especially to developing countries, to help them to deal with the consequences of applying such standards in the framework of the ILO. We should also like to draw attention to Egypt's experience in structural adjustment and economic reform, which brought home to us the importance of framing structural adjustment policies with a social dimension. With that end in view, Egypt has set up a Social Fund for Development whose purpose is to develop employment, tackle unemployment by funding small industries and encourage investment in the projects concerned. In Egypt we consider that the achievement of social justice is vitally important and we are working towards that goal through active tripartite participation and the drafting of labour legislation conducive to an improvement in employment and working conditions.

We support the Director-General's proposal to prepare an annual report on the employment situation and the impact of economic and financial policies so as to be able to analyse the impact of economic developments on employment, to help countries to benefit from other countries' experience and to formulate policies and programmes that can reconcile economic development needs with rising employment and standards of living. In this connection, we agree with the inclusion of a permanent item in the Conference agenda entitled "World employment problems and standards of living". We also approve of the organization of high-level meetings during the March session of the Governing Body each year to consider the world employment situation and the main trends in the world economy that may influence the situation.

We have taken note of the Director-General's Report on the activities of the ILO in 1992 and 1993. While thanking the Director-General and his assistants for the activities conducted during the period, we are concerned to note the decline of 21 per cent in loans for technical cooperation projects in Africa, which represents a decline of about $16 million. The African region alone accounted for the entire reduction in credits for technical cooperation projects in 1992 and 1993. We hope that the ILO will resume the Organization's previous policy of supporting the African region and committing the requisite funds for technical cooperation projects in the region. The circumstances prevailing in Africa, which is suffering the ravages of poverty, desertification and drought, have led to increased emigration and massive cross-border migration. In addition, world economic trends have had a marked direct impact on the situation of the workers and peoples of the continent, and the problems of poverty and unemployment are even more acute than in the past, as noted by the Director-General in his Report to the Conference.

We also hope that credits to the Arab countries will be increased, since we expect an increase in the region's need for technical cooperation projects in response to the progress being made in the peace process, which has created the need for assistance on the part of various regional and international organizations since the signing of the Statement of Principles in September 1993 in Washington between the Israeli Government and the Palestine Liberation Organization and the signing of the agreement on the implementation of self-rule in Palestine, starting with the Gaza Strip and Jericho, in Cairo on 4 May 1994.

We agree with the Director-General on the importance of technical cooperation, which has become more essential than in the past because of the decline in development assistance in general and assistance through the United Nations in particular. We appreciate the Director-General's efforts to set up a new Development and Technical Cooperation Department responsible for establishing the forms, means and content of technical cooperation, adapting it to changing circumstances and the increased needs of member States and gearing it to the full achievement of tripartite participation in that field. We hope that these measures will have the desired impact and that the Organization will continue to seek additional sources of financing to meet increased needs, especially those of the regions in which favourable political developments are under way such as South Africa and Palestine, in order to enhance the national capabilities of those countries and help them to achieve self-sufficiency.

Original Spanish: Mrs. ROZAS VELÁSQUEZ (Workers' delegate, Chile) – Permit me to begin by congratulating the President of this session of the Conference on his election as a representative of the workers. At this 81st Session, held in the 75th anniversary year of the ILO, we must think hard about the Organization's future.

This analysis is of the utmost interest for workers. In our opinion, the ILO has been a successful and creative institution, which has made a significant contribution to the progress of humanity in general and to the well-being of workers in particular. From our point of view, if the ILO did not exist there is no doubt that it would be necessary to create it.

For this reason, we disagree with the mere suggestion that anything should be done to weaken this important and unique tripartite Organization.

The workers of Chile can testify to the usefulness of the ILO in the field of labour relations and, above all, for the promotion of principles and values which are of direct concern to workers and lie at the base of all social coexistence based on respect for the individual.

For a long time, Chilean workers saw the ILO as just one more international forum where money was spent to feed rhetoric and maintain a bureaucracy which had little to do with the day-to-day problems of peoples.

We had to undergo a harsh and bitter experience, to a large degree caused by our own mistakes, to experience first hand the effectiveness of the ILO as an institution protecting fundamental labour rights and, in the end, as the incarnation and reminder of an essential human message.

When many trade union and labour rights were violated in our country, the ILO acted promptly and effectively. Although many Conventions and Recommendations had not been ratified by Chile, the directors and the staff of the ILO had the will and the wisdom to find ways of carrying out their essential mission. It is no exaggeration to say that the work of the ILO saved the lives of many workers.

In the early days of the revival of democracy in our country, the ILO played a very important role in the promotion of social dialogue. Even under the military government, the ILO's representative in Chile at the time, Mr. Klaus Moll, succeeded in bringing together around the same table trade union and employers' leaders, who had until then lacked any channel of communication. He organized trips to this old continent, including to this Office, so that people could see for themselves how dialogues and conversation took place between employers and workers. This established human relationships which at that time were unprecedented and almost inconceivable.

We Chilean workers can testify on the basis of our own experience to the fact that the ILO, despite its limitations, plays a role of the utmost importance in defending fundamental values not only of concern to workers but to all of civilized mankind. This is particularly true in times of crisis, which often arise in our countries.

We can testify to the fact that the work of the ILO does not block the simultaneous achievement of sustained economic development and higher levels of justice and equity. In Chile we have been moving forward, maintaining sustained economic growth and at the same time overcoming the poverty which still afflicts many Chileans, albeit with difficulty and less rapidly than we would have liked.

In our country we have achieved considerable macroeconomic successes with a very important contribution on the part of the workers, but we still have far to go in achieving a fair distribution of the wealth thus generated.

We must state that on the way we have not encountered any obstacles in the standard-setting work or other activities of the ILO. On the contrary, these have helped our country to advance, albeit slowly, towards social equity. It is clear that mainly in the Chilean entrepreneurial sector voices have been heard suggesting that there should be flexibility in the number of standards which lay down basic rights, particularly as concerns job security, collective bargaining and the role of trade unions. But our experience is that, with sensitivity and creativity, it is possible to find ways of reconciling the challenges of economic growth in an increasingly competitive world with the need to preserve and promote the basic rights of the people involved.

Flexibility cannot be understood as merely deregulation which does away with acquired rights for workers, but rather as a re-regulation. Flexibility is a new agreement which makes it possible to reconcile the need for flexibility with proper guarantees for workers and their families. This makes it possible to strike a balance between the demands of the modern world and economic and social equity.

It also makes it possible to provide clear and stable standards for all involved. It is very important for both workers and employers that changes should not be associated with insecurity. Adaptation to new realities cannot mean doing away with standards. That would bring about resistance, which is avoidable if there is at the national level a real will to generate development conditions of justice and equity. We cannot agree in the name of increased employment that should be disregarded, labour standards and all the more so when the workers in our country have demonstrated the maturity of placing the most urgent needs of the country before our sectoral interests. This has been recognized by public opinion both nationally and internationally. Unfortunately the same cannot be said of employers in Chile, who in both associate the growth of the country with their own growth, without considering the economic and social sacrifices of Chilean workers.

We workers are not in favour of situations which prevent development. We understand that when the rights guaranteed by a standard have no backing in economic reality, those rights are a dead letter. But we also maintain that economics is a human science which in the long run has the objective of ensuring human happiness and not the accumulation of goods and services for a sacred few. Economic development achieved at the expense of the majority is therefore nonsensical.

On the contrary, it is becoming ever clearer in today's world that the reorganization of the structures and management of enterprises is aimed at ensuring high productivity. It seeks an active commitment of the workers to take up the challenges which we have to face. Clearly this commitment cannot be achieved at the expense of the basic rights of the workers. There is a need for a new agreement in which both parties adapt their positions to present-day realities, and in which a fair balance is sought which will satisfy the interests of both sides. This is a challenge for the ILO, but also for governments and employers' representatives, for it is we that make up the ILO.

It is ironic that just as the world is becoming more universal there are some who seek to weaken or undermine the work of an international forum like the ILO. Today, more than ever before, there is a need for places where these three participants in international life can get together and discuss matters which are of interest to all mankind as it becomes more universal.

The ILO is a fundamentally relevant relevance because of its tripartite nature. International life, particularly as concerns its political and economic aspects, is today becoming less a matter for the exclusive concern of governments. A significant part of it is opening up to the active intervention of both employers and trade unions. For this reason the ILO's tripartism is a comparative advantage which we must preserve and strengthen.

We understand that in today's world new forms of work have emerged which have to be taken into account, but there are also new forms of entrepreneurial activity which are different from the traditional ones. The world of work is undergoing change.

We call for a strengthening of the role of the ILO as a place of meeting. We Chileans, who for many years were isolated in our own country, can appreciate the tremendous importance of dialogue and of a frank and open exchange of views in advancing towards our objective of development with social justice.

The world expects much of us. Despite the impressive progress recently made in various spheres of human activity, there is still much poverty, injustice and inequality which we as human beings cannot accept. The call for equity is first of all a moral one, but it must also be understood as a basic precondition for political stability and thus as factor in economic integration.

The ILO's long experience in this field enables the Organization to make an important contribution to our thinking and the decision making of other international organizations, and especially those of the United Nations system. In particular, the ILO can give very important assistance to the IMF and the World Bank in the drawing up of policies which reconcile economic growth with justice and equity.

Against this background, the ILO will be called upon to play a very relevant role at the World Summit for Social Development to be held next year. It is of vital importance that a fresh impetus should be given by that Summit to efforts to show solidarity and to cooperate in favour of development. Those efforts should lead to real progress toward the creation of a more integrated, more human world.

That is also the workers' message concerning the social clause. We are not calling for situations of absolute equality, but rather for economic and social progress towards equity. We must revitalize the ILO's basic functions toward that end, although we understand that those functions must correspond to present realities. Let us revitalize the noble role of the ILO with a view to making labour relations more human. That is the basis upon which peaceful coexistence at the national and world levels must be founded.

For these reasons, we call for an open and frank discussion on the future prospects of the ILO not in order to weaken the Organization, but on the contrary, to strengthen its basic principles and its essential functions. We workers know about difficulties and how to overcome them. It is not at this occasion that we are going to be any less ready to tackle them . If our readiness is met with good faith by a commitment from governments and employers, then there is hope for the world of work.

(Mr. Ould Sidi takes the Chair.)

Original Spanish: Mr. REILLY SALAVERRY (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Uruguay) – The Government of Uruguay firmly supports the International Labour Organization's 75 years of vigorous activity. Together with the Director-General, we are aware of the many achievements, but also share his concerns in the face of the serious changes affecting the world to such an extent as to call the basis of this institution and its future work into question.

The fall of the Berlin Wall, the globalization of the world economy, the impact of far-reaching technological changes, new management practices in enterprises and many other factors – as set forth in the Report of the Director-General – place us in a world entirely different from of 1919, when the Organization was founded. These reasons lend legitimacy to our concerns and demand our reflection.

Some of the changes are to be found in the irresistible changes in all forms of communications. The world is shrinking in size, but improved communications are stimulating information interchange and boosting the regional blocs being set up worldwide. Uruguay belongs to MERCOSUR, a grouping that brings us together with Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay. The creation of more open economies in the region is a challenge but, in the same way as other countries faced with the task of government, we have, on many occasions, given thought to the reasons that led to the creation of the International Labour Organization. But we also have come to the conclusion that, over and beyond the changes through which we are living, there remains a number of major long-term truths.

Following the Industrial Revolution with its great social injustices in North America and Europe – the geographic and human heartland of capitalism and industrialization – it was realized that working conditions had to be humanized and advances made in key areas of social security. However, governments were reluctant to grant these benefits which they saw would raise labour costs and damage the competitiveness of labour-intensive industries on world markets. From this came the conclusion that what was needed was something more than a national solution. There had to be a supranational organization that would lay down universal standards establishing minimum conditions of life in all aspects of industrial relations.

Thanks, in large part, to the efforts of the North American and European trades unions, the Peace Treaty of Versailles in 1919 brought into existence, for the reasons just mentioned and as a contribution to tangible social justice, the International Labour Organization. Today, with a world that is growing ever smaller while trade is expanding and countries become increasingly interdependent, the lack of respect for minimum labour conditions in many countries is contributing to unequal and unfair competition. Consequently, we must ask ourselves – should we not redouble our efforts to extend social justice more effectively to all corners of the world? Our answer is a resounding "yes". Moreover, we believe that finding the right mechanisms to achieve this objective is part of the role that our era has traced out for the ILO.

In making these statements, Uruguay draws on many years of loyal ILO membership. The Republic of Uruguay is the Latin American country which has ratified the largest number of international labour Conventions; in fact, it holds fourth place in the league table worldwide. Added to this are our continuing efforts to ensure that these labour standards are applied. All this obviously leads to the concern we feel when we look at the inequalities scattered across the globe, indicating, if only fleetingly, the possibility that competitive success on the international market may be won by countries that promote precarious working conditions for its citizens. We may be battling through a storm of global change but there still remain certain everlasting truths.

The reasons which led to the creation of the International Labour Organization are still with us. However, at the beginning of this century there were but few industrialized countries; now, growing concerns about social equity and the hierarchical structuring of human labour are being projected at a more worldwide level.

In presenting the view of the Uruguayan Government to this august assembly, we realize our ideas are not very innovative. We wish merely to lend our support to the statements made in the Report of the Director-General. With so much already achieved and with new horizons before us, I should like to say, on behalf of the Government of Uruguay, that we will support the search for new instruments that can contribute to better working conditions and industrial relations throughout the world, and we express our confidence in the excellent work that is being done and still remains to be done by the ILO.

Original German: Mr. ENGLIS (Workers' delegate, Slovakia) – It is a particular honour for me to be able to address this Conference as a representative of the largest trade union organization in my country, that is the Confederation of Trade Union Associations of the Slovak Republic. I particularly value this opportunity because it is taking place in the 75th anniversary year of the International Labour Organization.

For us, the ILO is and remains the most important world organization which protects the rights of workers as well as those of trade unions. We therefore support the reaffirmation of the ILO's mandate as stated in the Director-General's Report.

I would like now to indicate the basic areas with which our Confederation is most closely concerned. In our country, we are undergoing a process of privatization. The trade unions are watching this process closely because the fate of workers in the privatized firms is not a matter of indifference to us. We are particularly paying heed to the preservation of employment, labour security and occupational health and collective bargaining and to the guarantee – or indeed the expansion – of social rights. This is no easy task because there we need to change a whole series of legal provisions, which were adopted under entirely different systems and which need to be adapted to present-day principles. We believe that ILO standards must be incorporated into new legislation in the social area.

We do not support "soft laws". We welcome the idea that ILO standards, such as those of the freedom of association, protection against discrimination and prohibition of child labour and forced labour should be declared in the World Charter of Workers' Rights. In connection with this, the ILO must play a leading role in integrating the social clause into the rules of international trade. This would bring the basic rights of workers in the World Charter of Workers' Rights in line with the documents of the World Trade Organization.

The transformations in the economy are accompanied by changes in the entire system of social and health care. In the social sphere, the protective role of the State is gradually being abandoned and we are moving towards a social insurance based on social solidarity and participation of citizens. The National Insurance Institution, which is responsible for old-age and health insurance, has been functioning for one year. However, it has not as yet proved to be entirely positive; in our view, it is necessary to change its working concept.

Last year, an employment fund was also set up which is developing its work on the basis of contributions by both employers and workers. The purpose of this fund is to make social provision for the unemployed.

Our Confederation is taking an active part in preparations to transform the system of social insurance and its accompanying legislation. We have also submitted our views on economic and social problems to a number of scientific institutions and sought their advice. Recently, we signed an agreement with the Economic University of Bratislava; and we can now be sure that any proposals we make to the Government and employers will have a scientific basis.

The Tripartite Council has only been operating in our country for a short time. We were behind its establishment, and believe it is vitally important. We fully support the idea that the solution of problems should be sought with all three social partners, as well as the idea that there should be closer involvement of the trade unions in this system.

We maintain this, although the trade unions have had to conduct very difficult negotiations this year on the conclusion of this year's general agreement with the social partners. After lengthy meetings with the Government, the latter finally decided to abandon wage controls and agreed to the establishment of a social fund. This fund is intended to promote the solution of social policies in firms and organizations and be constituted by all workers in this transitional period. The general agreement was finally signed. But then there was a change of government and the new Government refused to honour these two commitments. A few days ago, however, a law was adopted in the Slovak Parliament on the social fund. We regard this as a success.

As concerns the regulation of wages, the present Government has not yet submitted any official bill. Wage controls, together with other restrictions, constitute a threat to social peace.

Apart from measures which affect all workers, we are also concerning ourselves with measures which have repercussions – mostly negative – on certain individual groups. I might mention as an example the problems facing pensioned miners and miners' widows, namely the abolition of benefits and allowances in kind.

Trade unions also have to fend off attacks on their own rights. The tax authorities are trying to intervene in the internal organization of our Confederation. To cap it all, they tried to investigate our accounts for 1989 – when the so-called "revolutionary trade union movement" was in force and we, as a Confederation, did not even exist! Shortly before I left for Geneva, I received written information from the Minister of Finance concerning a proposed solution to this matter. If there is no improvement in the situation, we shall be obliged to call upon the ILO for help in finding a solution to this problem.

In this context, we are fortunate that we can look not only to our membership to help us in solving our problems with all social partners but also to the ILO. I would therefore welcome developing cooperation between our Confederation and the ILO – particularly in the field of education and training. We welcome the ILO's proposal to transform the institute for trade union training of the Slovak Republic into a training centre.

I am extremely pleased that the next tripartite meeting will be held in Slovakia. I hope that our debate on present tripartite issues will continue to be as constructive in Bratislava in September as it is here in Geneva at present.

Original Farsi: Mr. ALIHOSSEINI (Deputy Minister for Cultural and International Affairs, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I would first like to congratulate the President on his election to preside over this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, as well as the Vice-Presidents on their election. I also welcome the dismantling of apartheid and the presence of a non-racial South Africa at our forum.

This year, special importance is being attached to the International Labour Conference. Special ceremonies are being held to mark the 75th anniversary of the ILO which, in its long history, has continuously strived to protect the rights of the workers and formulate international labour standards.

The 75th anniversary of the ILO indeed merits celebration. It is also time to review the role and position of this Organization. Fortunately, the Director-General has attended to this important task in his Report to the Conference entitled Defending values, promoting change. I congratulate the Director-General for choosing this theme. We agree that the values and principles of social justice, which are enshrined in the Constitution of the Organization, should be further protected and promoted. These principles should not fall victim to international political developments.

Some of the recent global changes are mentioned in the Report. We are in the last decade of a century which has seen the worst widespread crimes against humanity. The Cold War was one of the most harmful and useless conflicts imposed on humanity after the Second World War. The Cold War was the competition of powers for global dominance. People should never be made to suffer from such conflicts. The defeat of communism clearly indicates the incompatibility of that system with human nature. Political doctrines need to take all the material and spiritual dimensions of human beings into account. With the defeat of communism, one of the barriers for the material and spiritual progress of humanity has been dismantled, while the other barriers are still in place – and the masters of wealth, power and illusion continue to seek the imposition of their ambitions. Dangers of a bipolar or a unipolar world are clear enough. The end of the bipolar world can be celebrated only when injustice is replaced by justice in world affairs.

The Report has referred to the victory of the market economy. A distinction needs to be made between the market economy, which is a scientific and instrumental mechanism, and capitalism, which is a political, social and economic system. Capitalism, by giving the sovereignty to capital, is in contrast with human nature and interests – while the market mechanism as a scientific instrument can be used for the achievement of social and economic objectives. Democratization, too, should be discussed in the light of a proper understanding of human beings and their divine nature and interests – as well as their freedom from the domination of any individual, bureaucracy or power based on capital. Some have taken democracy as an ideology substituting any other ideology and even used it as a political instrument for global domination and imposition of their belief – even their traditions – on others. At times, they have even, in the name of democracy, rejected the wishes of the majority of people in particular areas of the world. Defence of basic values necessitates the defence of freedom and participation and the process of public decision-making of the people.

Turning to the globalization of the economy, it should be underlined that the division of the world into a rich North and a poor South is not only unjust and inhumane but also economically wasteful. The gap between North and South continues to expand. In the process of economic globalization, the political solidarity of the South will be decisive.

The Director-General has referred to the decline of Nation-States; this warrants hesitation and argument. Which authority would benefit from the decline in Nation-States? The United Nations and the Security Council, unfortunately, in several cases such as increasing regional conflicts – of which Bosnia and Herzegovina is a bloody and alarming example – have demonstrated their inability; and, with the right to veto, they have limited the decision-making to the interests of a few countries. In any event, they cannot fill the gap caused by the decline of Nation-States. Therefore, economic globalization should not weaken the political independence of the countries.

The Director-General has cited a few examples of increasing social problems. This is the right time and the right place to attend to the widening social gap. Other international organizations should also place social progress and justice amongst the most important items on their agendas. The ILO has been in the forefront in this field and should continue to be so.

The principles enshrined in the Constitution of the ILO that "labour is not a commodity" and "all human beings ... have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity", should continue to be the fundamental values of this Organization. Nevertheless, the Organization needs to change – and this is a real need.

The Organization should focus its attention on efficiency, its terms of reference, responsiveness to the needs of constituents and a continuous evaluation of activities. Cost should be reduced wherever possible and only those activities should be carried out which are really and urgently needed. A more effective organization is better than a larger organization.

Attention should also be given to the fair distribution of services and field activities of the Organization. All the Members and regions should benefit equally from the services of multidisciplinary teams and field coverage. The ILO should not miss opportunities. The important developing countries should receive the ILO's attention according to their needs and merits.

Standard-setting and supervision should continue to be the major tasks of the ILO and the member States should be assisted in the application of standards through training and technical cooperation.

Supervision should continue to be universal and include all the member States. Selective attitudes should be avoided at all costs. Fortunately, in the ILO, the application of standards in all the member States, whether developed or developing, is discussed in the Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. This non-selective approach of the ILO is a value in itself and also an advantage over other international organizations. This is an example which the other international organizations should be encouraged to adopt for the next century. These values should be strengthened in any future revision of the Organization.

I would like to emphasize that any revision in the standard-setting and supervisory procedures should take place with great caution and after extensive discussion of each and every detail; and consensus should be reached after tripartite consultations with the member States. These reforms should be carried out in a gradual and transparent manner over a period of time.

Concerning the "social clause", we agree with other developing countries that, in view of the existing international environment, the social clause would be an instrument for the new and more complex forms of protectionism. International trade should facilitate development and therefore lead to the promotion of social conditions in developing countries.

Concerning technical cooperation, we support the active partnership policy. The full realization of an active partnership policy requires a fair coverage of member States and the presence of the ILO in the regions, as well as the coverage of multidisciplinary teams.

The Islamic Republic of Iran was a founder Member of the International Labour Organization in 1919. Recent years have witnessed the importance that we attach to the ILO. International labour standards are referred to in the Labour Code of the Islamic Republic of Iran. We have participated actively in all ILO activities and now as a titular member of the Governing Body, we support the defence of values and the promotion of change.

The Seminar on Employment and Development, which was held in Teheran in May 1994, was attended by the distinguished Deputy Ministers of Labour from the Republics of Armenia, Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan. The Seminar discussed the issues of employment, privatization and tripartism and, on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO, strongly supported the social objectives and the role of the International Labour Organization. The participants of the Seminar also requested the expansion of subregional cooperation and the participation of the ILO in horizontal technical cooperation between the Islamic Republic of Iran and the countries in the region.

We hope that the ILO Office in Teheran will also receive further attention and that necessary steps for a revision of its activities will be undertaken. We would willingly cooperate as much as possible in this task.

Some pending problems on technical cooperation between the ILO and the Islamic Republic of Iran and the countries in the region need to be solved. In this respect we welcome the initiatives taken by the International Labour Office. We believe that more attention should be given to technical cooperation, advisory services, seminars, symposia and sectoral activities, and particularly ILO support for subregional activities.

Original French: Mr. PENDY-BOUYIKI (Minister of Labour and Human Resources, Gabon) – I am very happy to be able to head the Gabon delegation to this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, during the course of which the ILO is celebrating its 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

This important session under the leadership of its President is characterized by discussions of a notable character. My delegation is very satisfied by this and, having watched the way he has directed the work of the Conference until now, we have no doubts as to the final success to be achieved.

Allow me also to congratulate the Director-General who has, on this occasion, received various alarm signals from the constituents of our Organization and who has proposed that the Conference reflect on the future of the ILO and the role which it should currently play within the system of international organizations. We have given the Report which he presented on this subject the attention which it deserves. The historical particularity of the current session adds to the opportune character of this Report.

The ILO has reached a turning point in its history assisted by landmarks which should lead it to redefine its plans and means of action at each moment along the way. The most important of these landmarks will be the World Summit on Social Development to be held next year, organized by the United Nations, in Copenhagen. The objective which the ILO will work toward at that Summit is full employment. Full employment is hypothetical to the extent that it depends on the international economy, the stability of exchange rates and the expansion of international credit, particularly to the detriment of transition countries and developing countries. Full employment at the local level is aimed at a known objective, namely the reduction of poverty and the assurance of the social protection of workers through solidarity among all social groups. We appreciate, consequently, the quality of the document submitted to the Conference on this subject. It is an accurate cross-section of the phenomenon of unemployment and the various possible options whereby it may be overcome.

I should like to say, nevertheless, that the means proposed by this document are directed at eliminating unemployment and its consequences, but it does not insist sufficiently upon the necessity of preventing it in the future, in other words, by substantially revamping vocational training systems. This is an urgent matter calling for cooperation between the ILO and UNESCO, because we are aware that unemployment is not irreversible.

The success of the contribution of the ILO to the World Summit will depend upon its ability to shoulder the responsibilities entrusted to it by the United Nations, and particularly the indispensable reforms that must be carried out in accordance with this new orientation. These reforms should be undertaken within its structure, its functioning, its administration and its philosophy.

In terms of its structure, the contribution of multidisciplinary teams should be extended and the ILO should act decisively during the period of currency devaluation now taking place in the CFA free-trade zone.

We would like to see a voluntary contribution by the ILO to assist the meeting that the Ministers of Labour of French-speaking countries are planning to hold in Dakar at the end of this year.

In the field of administration the time has come to re-evaluate the criteria whereby positions are assigned within the ILO, a re-evaluation arising from the admission of new Members and the globalization of the economy.

Furthermore, a greater democratization of the bodies of the ILO should make it possible for the Organization to wield power equivalent to that of international financial organizations, as regards the establishment of rules for foreign trade and development policies.

One of the reforms pursued by the ILO is linked to improving the promotion of its standards. So far, two measures have been tried. The first consisted of linking technical cooperation and standards. The Report of the Director-General of the ILO recalls that in 1992 the Governing Body debated at length the question of strengthening the links between these two basic fields of our action.

The Report also stated and I quote "Although such an appeal may seem truistic, the ambiguity of the term £links' has, on the one hand, raised expectations and, on the other, caused a certain unease." Afterwards, "the two lines of ILO action moved separately and in parallel. It is time they converged. Action to bring them closer together does not imply, and has never implied, imposing a condition of ratification or application for extending technical cooperation, or for brandishing technical cooperation as a reward or punishment, or banning a member State." We take careful note of this.

The project was suspended by the Governing Body. Today the member States are facing a new problem, that of linking access to international markets to the ratification and the implementation of ILO standards. Certain of these countries have observed that under their current form too little preparation has gone into the means proposed to allow for the adaptation of action and standard-setting machinery of our Organization to the new social reality arising from the liberalization of international trade and the globalization of production and markets, which is not reassuring. However, the insistence upon social clauses in trade treaties for promoting the human dignity of workers and their families is a project which Gabon will support. My country has ratified the ILO Conventions considered as fundamental by most member States because they lead to abolition of forced labour, equality of treatment, minimum wage of access to employment, freedom of association and collective bargaining.

However, Gabon has reservations as to establishing a social clause so that we will not know: the nature of the social norms to be retained; the applicability of the reciprocal conditions; related provisions; and the surveillance and supervisory provisions.

Such prudence is not surprising, because if the economic growth of our States is conditioned by this clause, so too is development. And by the same token, it could compromise the growth of productive employment, seeing that employment has during this decade become a priority for both developing and developed countries.

In Gabon the rate of unemployment is close to 12 per cent. There is a beginning of a solution, with the implementation of special measures by the National Employment Office and the Assistance Funds for Employment and Redeployment.

This Office and these funds, entrusted with the promotion of employment, information on employment, and employment policy evaluation will make it possible to ensure a certain flexibility of the labour market and to encourage geographic and socio-professional mobility.

As to the substantive options, Gabonese policy tends to encourage the development of small and medium-sized enterprises and free-lance employment, as in most developing countries.

We have also noted that two diverging tendencies are emerging in the development of ILO member States: a tendency for a return to the human scale among developing countries, in contrast to a tendency toward globalization of the market economy among developed countries.

This is the dilemma of our economies. Is it time to ask whether liberalism might have its limits; and if globalization of the market economy should continue to generate unemployment, might not international solidarity signal the natural limit to this liberalism?

The International Labour Organization should distinguish itself by establishing and strengthening the rules for this international solidarity.

The ILO should occupy a select place in these international decision-taking centres, so that it may incessantly watch over the social capital of humanity. To this end, it should provide itself with human resources capable of carrying out this task.

It should listen to its constituents and their people, and to the voice that says "labour is not a commodity", and that there should be a quantitative and qualitative aspect to employment policies.

This is the mandate with which Gabon provides the ILO on the threshold of the twenty-first century. To the extent of its humble ability, my country will contribute to helping it obtain the means of carrying out this task.

I do not want to conclude without congratulating the Republic of South Africa for having thrown off the despicable system of apartheid, and for having rejoined the ILO.

My country hopes that the ILO, after supporting South Africa in winning its democracy, will provide it with moral and technical support in the years to come, in order to keep its democratic regime firmly in place.

I should like to reiterate to the age-old guarantor of social peace and prosperity for workers and their families, that being the International Labour Organization, my best wishes for longevity.

Original French: Mr. BAKEVYMUSAYA (Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Burundi) – On behalf of the Republic of Burundi and my delegation, I would like to associate myself with the preceding speakers in congratulating warmly Mr. Charles Gray, President of this session of the Conference, and all the Officers of the Conference on the occasion of their brilliant election to their posts at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. Their experience, competence, and eminent personal qualities will help, I am sure, to ensure the success of our work.

I would like to take this opportunity, when our Organization is commemorating 75 years of existence and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, to express my gratitude to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO and all those who have preceded him in this post for the excellent work carried out by the ILO, despite the various geopolitical upheavals it has had to face.

At this particular juncture we should take stock of our activities in order to renew our decisions and actions. The first part of the Report of the Director-General entitled Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda provides a clear view and in-depth analysis of the issues which must be addressed urgently by this session of the Conference.

We know that the International Labour Organization was created to contribute to world peace, through the promotion of social justice. It would therefore not be excessive to assess how far we have come in this regard and possibly realign our objectives with the situation as it stands or as we expect it to change.

The 81st Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at a particular and critical moment in the history of Burundi.

My country is going through the most serious social and political crisis since independence.

This is due to an abortive coup d'état in October 1993 which resulted in the death of His Excellency Melchoir NDADAYE, the first democratically elected Civil President in our country and in the death of some of his closest colleagues, including the Vice-President of the National Assembly and the Minister of the Interior. This attempted onslaught on the democratic institutions set up after the elections of June 1993 led to ethnic and political massacres of the population in almost all the provinces of the country. The death count is estimated to be tens of thousands and the costs of rebuilding the decimated, and seriously damaged basic social infrastructures will be high for an economy already in the throes of adjustment.

Just over two months ago the new President elected by the National Assembly was killed in an air crash. This succession had had negative repercussions at the level of the economy as it was seen as applying the brakes to a machine moving in top gear towards democracy and development, aiming particularly to help the most vulnerable sectors, as they are known.

I would like to take this opportunity to launch an official appeal to our Organization and its Members to help my country in its reconstruction efforts.

The contribution of the delegation of Burundi to the discussion of the Report of the Director-General will of course focus particularly on the first part, Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda.

My delegation unhesitatingly supports the principles, objectives and strategies put forward in this Report.

History has shown us that the world is in a constant state of flux and the Report of the Director-General has confirmed this very well. Since the creation of the ILO after the end of the First World War, we have witnessed the opposition of the East to the West, the socialist bloc to the capitalist bloc, and the north to the south. Many leaders of the Third World were able to play upon this rivalry between the two blocs. Today, with an end to the adversarial relationship between East and West, a radical transformation of other elements of the international order is under way.

The triumph of the market economy over the planned economy, political and institutional democratization, and structural adjustment programmes have raised and highlighted the hopes that progress and well-being will embrace the working classes of several countries of the world, particularly the developing countries, including Burundi.

Most African countries have understood this. In view of this assessment, many studies have been carried out, and projects to help urban and rural populations have been set up with the support of the ILO or other foreign partners. Positive results have been achieved here and there, particularly at the level of creating and promoting productive employment.

Unfortunately, the economic growth consistent with this situation, registered in the 1970s, is now running into other increasingly serious problems. In this period of historic change, the prevailing wind, bringing the democratization of political systems and economic adjustment, has been too strong in several developing countries. The recognition of multipartism, and the holding of free elections subsequently claimed by opposition forces have not necessarily brought the results we expected.

In his Report to the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, Democratization and the ILO, the Director-General quite rightly said that "the transition from authoritarianism to democracy is fraught with dangers: some countries have found it easier than others", however, some people feel "more destitute than ever before". Ethnic and social tension and conflict which were kept down under totalitarian or one-party regimes are flaring up and replacing ideological conflict.

These new forms of extreme nationalism and tribalism also raise the spectre of the disintegration of society as they hold peace to ransom often for a long time.

Nevertheless, my delegation welcomes and faithfully believes in the growing awareness engendered by the ILO of the need to establish and protect world peace, without which the promotion and development of social justice is impossible.

The ILO has its values and its structures. It also enjoys universal means of action which fortunately have weathered the storm of major changes and the vicissitudes of the world economic situation. Today these changes are multiplying, maybe under a different guise and with such unequal intensity that our Organization cannot afford to underestimate them. We therefore call on the ILO, in the year of its anniversary, to bring its standard-setting activities and technical cooperation back into line with this new social and political reality. We also pay tribute to and eagerly partake of the system of active partnership set up by the ILO since last year. We are truly convinced that if Members have recourse regularly to the multidisciplinary teams set up in all regions of the world, they will be able to find satisfactory solutions to a number of topical issues.

This session of the International Labour Conference coincides with South Africa's first forays into a new era of pluralist democracy under the leadership of Mr. Nelson Mandela, the first black President after more than three centuries of authoritarian power and white discrimination. We will always remember the major contribution made by our Organization to the eradication of apartheid and racism in South Africa. The ILO and all its member States must revel in the results now achieved in this African country.

Nevertheless, we must not lose sight of the fragility of the embryonic democracies, as can be seen from the experience of some developing countries. The ILO should therefore take due account of this in all its future work aimed specifically at the promotion of social justice and the strengthening of social dialogue through tripartism. Experience will have shown that consultation, negotiation and a search for consensus are the most efficient ways of re-establishing and consolidating peace.

Before concluding, I would like to voice the urgent appeal made by my country to the member States of our Organization, for an end to political, ethnic or racial conflicts in several areas of the world. The survival of universal peace depends on it.

With regard to Burundi and the subregion, I hope that the international community will not fail to support us as we move towards national reconciliation and reconstruction.

Finally, I would like to reiterate my hope that the work of this session will end in success and be to the satisfaction of the Members and all the delegations attending this session of the Conference.

I wish you all happy anniversary.

Long live the ILO and long live international solidarity.

Original Arabic: Mr. RAYESS (Government delegate, Lebanon) – I would like to congratulate the President on the confidence shown in him in his election to the presidency on the unique occasion of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for his excellent work and that of his collaborators in preparing for this Conference and for his excellent Report which is full of bold and sincere ideas for both the present and the future.

I have read the Report entitled Defending values, promoting change in which the Director-General presents the Organization on the occasion of its Diamond Anniversary, like a painting depicting serenity and joie de vivre. He has, however, adopted a rigorous scientific approach to define the role of the Organization until the end of the twentieth century and beyond.

We, the participants of the Conference are all like the Director-General: we have come here to celebrate an anniversary, leaving behind serious concerns. Every State today is looking for a lace in the sun in the stormy years ahead. Every State is today turning its back on ideological struggles and participating, whether they like it or not, in the struggle for civilization. We are living in a strange world. On the one hand we are dominated by economic blocs that have technological mastery and access to a vast array of information, which they use to impose their strategic balance on the new world market. On the other hand, we are experiencing the failure of countless bodies that are seeing their development hopes crumble like dust, be it due to debt, pollution, cultural invasion or the diffusion of a modern culture that classifies the world as a minority of inventors and producers and a majority of weak consumers with no possibilities of recourse.

In the framework of these materialistic, protected empires, the Director-General would like to draw up with us a new and fitting role for the ILO and a progressive concept of social justice which would satisfy both the leaders and those in their charge.

Like the Director-General, we are all seeking to redefine the role of Ministries of Labour and of tripartism, and we all aspire to a society of abundance in the context of social justice. But if we are not to wake up one day to find ourselves with a system of social justice without justice, with a form of democracy which is not all that it appears to be, or with governments in capable of governing, I would like to present my point of view, basing myself on three facts.

Firstly, we are living in a world that is evolving at a speed and in a manner to which we are completely unaccustomed. We need to develop our philosophy of labour so that it does not just concern employers, workers and administrations, but countries as a whole. We must create a trend of opinion and not limit ourselves to workers' education and training, but instead disseminate these ideas in each home, school, enterprise and organization, be it economically, socially or media oriented. It has become imperative that the voice of the workers be heard beyond its present narrow confines, and be expressed by all, irrespective of social status.

Secondly, States must restore the equilibrium in professional relations, so that the term "social partners" becomes more than just an expression. We must act with the conviction that the money we spend on the maintenance of machinery, the organization of trade fairs to promote products and the dissemination of these products, with the helping hand of the media, must correspond to equivalent sums used to protect workers and to safeguard their dignity.

Thirdly, it is indeed strange to see that there are countries spending billions of dollars to explore distant planets while they skimp on a planet so near. We are not opposed to science, but we live on this planet, Earth, and on Earth there is hunger, poverty, sickness and fear, and these are very real threats. To relieve the world of these ills is easy. For the cost of a nuclear submarine you could build a whole city. For the cost of an aircraft carrier you could build hospitals capable of treating tens of thousands of patients for 20 years. The cost of a squadron of fighter aircraft would suffice to provide education for a whole generation of poor and illiterate people, the latter of which number in the millions.

I say this because my country, and I myself, have suffered division and war. We continue to suffer, while negotiating for peace. We suffer from the havoc wreaked by Israel, which destroys houses, which burns crops, which blocks the employment cycle, which expels workers, which kills and kidnaps, claiming that by such terrorism it combats terrorism. For Israel, anyone who fights against the occupation, who defend his land, his home and his honour is a terrorist. This is the logic of force, with all the madness and arrogance it entails. Judge for yourselves.

In conclusion, let me say that I do not fear for the future of our Organization because an organization which carries the torch of freedom and social justice cannot grow old.

On my own behalf and on behalf of my country, I am proud to belong, as we have belonged since 1948, to this Organization. Notwithstanding its limited resources, it has given us material and technical assistance, particularly in the fields of vocational training, worker education, market studies and the development of work methods using computers.

As regards freedom of association and the rights of workers, there have been some doubts expressed. I would like to say the following:

First of all, a government which constructs a country on the vestiges of war and with a strongly devalued currency cannot allow wages to continue rising for fear that this may entail even worse inflation than in the past, with a loss of buying power. We are trying to calculate these increases to guarantee a fair rise in the standard of living.

Secondly, trade unions have been authorized in some sectors with many workers. They are sectors which were previously deprived of all representation. This is proof of the Government's desire to increase this representation and to support democracy.

Thirdly, a new trade union structure adapted to the new situation is now the subject of legislation drafted by the Government. This does not mean that we are going to impose our draft on anyone. We will consult the unions and hear their point of view in a democratic way so as to achieve our common objective of comprehensive and democratic representation.

Finally, you have heard that the regional office of the ILO has been set up again in Beirut. We have given modest assistance to the temporary headquarters there. But we have also provided a large site on which a permanent headquarters can be built. I would like to thank all the friends and governments who have supported this decision, including the Director-General, Mr Michel Hansenne, and our friend Mr Dajani. I hope that by the close of this 81st Session of the Conference all the workers in that office will be back in Beirut.

Original Spanish: Mr. MENDOZA (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Venezuela) – I would like to congratulate the International Labour Organization for all of the work done by its staff in cooperating with our countries to achieve peace throughout the world.

I would also like to congratulate the President of the Conference, Mr. Charles Gray, and wish him every success in his work. I view his election as recognition of his personal merits and also as homage to the workers of the world and social justice.

All Venezuela is celebrating the anniversary of the International Labour Organization.

Seventy-five years in the life of an institution indeed brings a time for reflection; but the same can be said of the first anniversary or for that matter any other anniversaries, even if we were not confronted by events that are redrawing the political map in many countries, and even if we were not witnessing changes in the world of labour brought about by advances in science and technology. In view of all this, the anniversary we are celebrating has special meaning for us.

As a delegate and Minister of Labour of Venezuela, I would like to take this opportunity to stress the bonds of friendship between my country and the International Labour Organization, and also the unshakeable faith of my country in the underlying principles of our Organization, especially its credo of social justice.

On 2 February of this year, when Dr. Rafael Caldera became the President of the Republic and head of Government. Dr. Caldera is known to most of you both as a statesman, as a professor of labour law and as a labour legislator. He is also known for his close connections with the International Labour Organization and those organizations which are affiliated to it.

The Government of Rafael Caldero has had to deal firmly with unemployment, inflation, falling purchasing power and the most serious crisis that our country's financial system has experienced. Only President Caldera's firm desire to protect crisis-hit workers' savings, wages and benefits has convinced him of the need to mortgage, for this important task, part of the very scarce resources available to him.

The situation I have described reflects what has been taking place in our country following transition from a government which turned a blind eye to corruption, condoned negligence on the part of high officials and undermined the motivation of essential public services. This situation is radically changing, and the hope of a better future lights the horizon. The Venezuelan workers' delegate – José Beltrán Vallejo – has, however, already given you a faithful account of this situation.

Maintaining democracy under these conditions, especially when certain workers and employers are openly, and for some unknown reason, opposing the Government's decisions, whereas others have given us their firm and conscientious support, has proved possible only because of our President's high moral stature and his ability to mobilize the resources necessary to overcome this crisis.

We are, thanks to God, beginning, little by little, to introduce social policies, some of which are designed to make up for the loss of real wages whilst others are intended to improve workers' social security and living and working conditions, and allow workers to benefit from their leisure time.

In addition to the work done by President Caldera, Venezuelan delegations have attended many general and regional conferences; more important still, we need to highlight the cooperation that has existed between the International Labour Office and Venezuela throughout its history.

The world today is undergoing many changes; it is, therefore, appropriate that during this meeting we should think carefully about the future of our Organization.

The disappearance of the Soviet Union as standard-bearer of Marxist ideology, and the recent appearance of new States supporting new concepts based on a growing faith in democracy as the value that can help us to deal with the uncertainties of the future, is one of the trends we need to look at. We should not forget that the poverty and hunger are the factors that rapidly eat away at this system, which means that we must continue to work together and spare no efforts to improve the well-being of all.

The last two revolutions in the world of labour have, like all others, and will continue to have, man as their victim. The social and economic crisis in the early decades of this century – inaptly called the industrial revolution by labour historians – placed the burden squarely on the shoulders of the workers. We can all remember unrestricted working hours, inadequate wages, lack of protection for workers, child labour and the very precarious situation of women.

The anniversary we are celebrating is taking place in the midst of the technological revolution. Automation, with robotization as its ultimate manifestation, is flooding the market with products that amaze by their efficiency and dull the worker's natural defence mechanisms. None of us can understand how, in times of such human progress and well-being for many individuals and families, we as politicians find ourselves at the edge of a precipice where we will have to either change our trade or increase our skills in order to keep going.

This reality is perplexing but from an historic and philosophical point of view, what we are seeing is that social theories are being overturned by the rebirth of individualism. The owners of capital do not hesitate to make the right to work conditional upon the elimination of workers' rights; and their strategy lies in convincing us of the virtues of flexibility in labour standards and of deregulation.

From the economic point of view, they are exploiting the crisis to call for a reduction in the role of the State and demand privatization. However, in every county, those benefiting from privatization stipulate as a condition for transferring goods from the State to the private sector, the disappearance of the workers' rights to full employment and to benefit from advantages laid down in the law.

We are convinced that the future of our Organization must be based on preserving existing values and maintaining the belief that social justice is the best way to re-establish a balance and harmony between those who have everything and can do anything and those who have nothing and can therefore do nothing.

I should like to take this opportunity to draw the attention of those who work for the International Labour Organization and of the world's true proponents of tripartism to the fact that, in all of our countries, unfair practices are becoming increasingly common and unscrupulous employers are making ever greater use of them. Using these practices, they establish fake trading and civil relationships to enrich themselves and erode the true nature of work that links them with wage-earners.

Therefore, both honest employers and workers who are suffering from the consequences, together with all those of us who are international and national civil servants, need to work together, multiplying our efforts in order to do away with these practices which are creating barriers to the work of the International Labour Organization, so that we can achieve our truly humane objectives.

There would be no point in proposing radical conclusions and rhetorical declarations at this memorable conference, if we were not convinced of the need to propose those ideas which we feel are actually feasible and to which we are firmly committed.

The labour crisis and, therefore, the workers' crisis is not unique to any one or number of countries. It is widespread as was pointed out here in this Conference by Mr. Boutros-Ghali, Secretary-General of the United Nations.

In our view, the social clauses are for some a way to ensure the future of the Organization. Their scope should be extended, beyond guaranteeing better working and living conditions for workers, to all types of international agreements and not merely trade agreements. They should be applied to any type of exchange.

The President of Venezuela, Dr. Caldera, had planned to attend this Conference but, for reasons beyond his control, he was unable to be with us and he asked me to present his apologies. However, he is here with us in thought and beside me when I propose that any decision adopted should not be protectionist with exaggerated social connotations, nor a result of a resurgence of individualism. Only if we maintain solidarity with workers can we ensure a future of peace and humanity for all.

Mrs. PUHAR (Minister of Labour, Family and Social Affairs, Slovenia) – Allow me first of all to congratulate the Officers of the Conference on their important roles at this session of the International Labour Conference which coincides with the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO. I am convinced that this Conference will be a successful one.

May I express my congratulations also to the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for his exceptional and inspiring presentation.

In his Report, the Director-General deals with a highly topical phenomenon which every day touches the countries in transition, Slovenia included. How can we at the same time protect our basic values, promote the needed change and safeguard social justice while experiencing globalization of the world economy? This is without doubt an extremely important question, especially for those of us who observe a crisis of values, rapid political change and economic deterioration for some groups in the population – highlighting the problem of social justice. At the same time we should, of course, like to participate fully in global economic trends and in general progress.

Taking Slovenia as an example, I should like to describe the relatively successful integration of economic and social policy which promoted economic development.

Following the proclamation of independence in June 1991, Slovenia developed towards a more open-market economy. Our country adopted numerous laws and other regulations bringing it closer to the standards and norms of western European countries and the European Community.

In 1992, Slovenia served a notice of accession to 65 ILO Conventions. At this moment, the process of ratification is beginning for several Conventions. I must underline that during Slovenia's political transition and the full implementation of the market economy, ILO Conventions, Recommendations and other documents provided steady orientation in the area of workers' rights and social justice. At the same time, they helped us to find an appropriate role for the State in these fields within the framework of a new economic and political system.

Due to political change and numerous unexpected events – the war in the Balkans, loss of our earlier markets, disruption in monetary and trade flows, and others – we were able to observe in Slovenia several developments with regard to the basic understanding of the role played in the economy by individuals, enterprises, social institutions and the State. Among some interest groups and political orientations which are fortunately a minority, there prevailed the opinion that financial success and corporate profits are the most important, regardless of the consequences for the individual. The welfare role of the State, in their opinion, ought to be reduced only to the support of the helpless and most needy. In my opinion, this model is inappropriate for small economies and industrially developed European countries. Fortunately, we have succeeded in preventing its application in Slovenia – at least up until now.

Despite worrying indicators regarding demographic trends and social dynamics in Slovenia (a relative decline of the active population and an increase in the number of retired persons, a relatively high rate of unemployment, an increase of so-called socially endangered groups, and a declining GDP per capita) we have, in my opinion, already passed the lowest point of our economic transition, and we have managed all this without major upheavals, general strikes or other forms of social conflict. A significant contributing factor to these achievements has undoubtedly been, the sensible labour and employment legislation and well-developed set of measures directly or indirectly influencing our labour market. These also include considerable state assistance to healthy and productive programmes promoting the restructuring of our economy and at the same time fuller employment.

In 1993, after several years of economic decline and stagnation Slovenia showed a modest increase in economic activities and in GDP. In 1994, we expect further economic growth at the rate of 2 to 2.5 per cent. At the same time, we also managed to control and to reduce inflation and to increase our monetary reserves. This year we have for the first time in four years witnessed a fall in the unemployment rate and since last year a substantial increase in labour demand. Several processes in Slovenia have still not developed to the full. The socially negative effects of the monetarist economic policy, of the corresponding new legislation and of stiffer external competition are still to be expected.

Nevertheless, all this cannot overshadow the positive results which we have already achieved by paying close attention to the social aspects of development. This approach ought to be present in state economic and social policies. A partial guarantee for these developments in the future is provided by the newly established Economic and Social Council of the social partners in Slovenia.

Our case confirms the basic idea expressed in the Director-General's Report. The promotion of change is compatible with a high level of social justice and protection, allowing for reasonable solutions, reached through consensus by the social partners. They also facilitate economic and financial viability while remaining within the limits of social acceptability. I believe that the social clause should be linked with economic considerations, taking into account the globalization and liberalization of world trade. At the same time, I would like to underline the importance of efforts aimed at enhancing and modernizing the labour standards which were mentioned in the Director-General's Report. I believe that these standards – hence, the substance of the social clause – should create a flexible system applicable to different levels of development and promoting justice in the distribution of gains from economic growth. Such a system would stimulate social and economic development and contribute to defining general labour and social standards for mankind.

The Slovenian Government supports the present orientation by the ILO and the conclusions of the Director-General's Report. We expect that the ILO will continue to strongly support economic progress and social justice on the national and global levels.

Mr. ARAGON (Government delegate, Belize) – On behalf of the Government and people of Belize, I want to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election. I wish them all understanding and success in these deliberations.

I would also like to express my gratitude and thanks to the International Labour Organization and its regional office for all the assistance it has given to the country of Belize, especially in the area of training and advice.

Permit me also to congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Organization for his excellent Report, which I have read very carefully. The theme Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda is a most timely and appropriate one.

The disintegration of the former Communist bloc and the formation of new trading blocs have created a new, challenging role for the ILO. Belize supports the view that while the ILO must continue to defend the principles embodied 50 years ago in the Declaration of Philadelphia, it must now take on a new role in the light of the constantly changing economic environment.

It is evident that the First World nations have embarked on a new world order with a view to amassing more wealth, and this has created a disturbing situation which could be disastrous to small, poor and developing nations. There is no doubt that these developed nations will continue to lead, and that developing countries will find it harder to rise above their present status. The hope is that the voices of developing countries will come together and let it be known loud and clear that there are values that must be respected and that social justice must shine on everyone. This is yet another reason why the ILO agenda is a most needed and welcome one.

On a more positive note, Belize welcomes the new worldwide trend towards democracy, particularly the abolition of apartheid and the emergence of a new South Africa. We are also happy to learn that the ILO has resumed technical aid to this country.

Belize attended the 48th Session of the United Nations General Assembly, and on that occasion Belize's Deputy Prime Minister outlined the country's position on a number of important regional and world issues.

On the subject of international development and economic relations, he stated that countries in the South, such as ours, were acutely aware of the shift in world trading patterns brought on by the formation of new trading blocs, the most recent and prominent of which are NAFTA and the single European market.

We recognize the fact, that our economies are threatened by these developments as our preferential access to markets steadily erodes and our terms of trade consistently worsen. We are hard pressed to find the resources required for comprehensive research, development and promotion programmes.

I therefore urge the countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development to identify and dedicate significant financial and technical resources to assist small countries in developing and commercializing alternative products.

Recently, Belize participated in the Seventh Meeting of Ministers of Labour for Central America, Panama, Belize and the Dominican Republic, which was held in El Salvador in April of this year. At the conclusion of this meeting Belize signed the Declaration of San Salvador, which called for cooperation in the fields of employment, the informal sector, labour legislation, social security, professional training, persons with disabilities and child labour.

I wish to state that my Government is committed to the following: revision and modernization of the labour laws in order properly to address the needs, working conditions and benefits of workers; setting up of an industrial tribunal by which matters relating to workers will be dealt with in a knowledgeable, practical and expeditious manner; setting up, through a revision of the law, a fair and readily accessible mechanism for the recognition of trade unions in the workplace.

My Government, will do its best to assure its workers a fair share of the nation's wealth and the social justice that comes from living in a nation that believes in a free, democratic and just way of life.

There is no doubt that in the best of democracies, there will be labour conflicts. These conflicts must not be viewed as problems, but rather as challenges that will make us rise to higher levels of understanding and also as an expression of the true democratic spirit that allows people the freedom to exercise their rights whenever they believe they are right. The greatness of democracy is best kept alive and vibrant when tested from time to time, so that its strengths and weaknesses can be evaluated and improved upon.

Let me take this opportunity to point out that where there is wealth along with oppression, where there is security for some and hope for none, where the rich get richer and the poor get poorer, there is no progress but rather human tragedy, because in the long run people will end up hating one another. The world, on the whole, can only speak of progress and development if humanity as a whole is moving towards peace and harmony. Our progress must never be measured by the wealth we have accumulated, but rather by the peace that we have achieved in learning to live with one another in a spirit of brotherhood. Together we save or we destroy this beautiful world of ours.

In conclusion, I would like to express my Government's fullest support for the efforts of the International Labour Organization to contribute to a better working environment, which is safe and equally secure for the social and economic well-being of all workers. It is our earnest hope that the deliberations of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference will be most successful, and that when we depart for our respective countries we will do so with a greater understanding, respect and concern for humanity on the whole.

I wish the ILO a happy 75th birthday. To everyone gathered here, I wish you the best of luck, and God's blessing to you all.

Mr. DIRIA (Minister for Labour and Youth Development, United Republic of Tanzania) – On behalf of the Tanzanian delegation, and on my personal behalf, permit me at the outset to sincerely congratulate Mr. Gray upon his assumption of the presidency of this important assembly, and assure him of our full cooperation in the discharge of his demanding tasks. I am fully confident that with his distinguished professional profile and diplomatic experience and skill, he will steer the deliberations of this Conference to a most successful conclusion.

This occasion is made more auspicious and honorable by the fact that it coincides with the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. In this regard allow me to pay tribute to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for his exemplary and diligent leadership as chief executive of the ILO at this critical juncture. In the same vein, I would like to express our appreciation to his predecessor and his staff, for their excellent support and services, ensuring over the years the smooth running of the International Labour Organization.

The celebration of the 75th anniversary has come with further good tidings. After more than 300 years of arduous struggle against the obnoxious system of apartheid, last April the world bore witness to the dawning of a new era of a democratically elected non-racial Government in South Africa, under the leadership of President Nelson Mandela. We reiterate our warmest and most sincere congratulations to the people of South Africa for hammering the final nail into the coffin of apartheid.

We should like to pay tribute to the role played by the ILO in supporting the South African struggle, particularly in the period after the adoption of the Declaration concerning the policy of apartheid. The success achieved in South Africa is a triumph of the principles of social justice which are central to the existence of the ILO itself.

I believe that there could be no better occasion to cap the ILO's 75th anniversary this year than that of giving a very warm welcome to the Republic of South Africa as it joins the ranks of the ILO membership.

In the same context, we should also wish to express our unreserved support for the admission of Tajikistan, Slovakia and Oman into the family of the ILO.

The subject of social justice in a global economy, as discussed in the Report of the Director-General before us, has indeed far-reaching implications for the ILO's future. We are pleased to note that this subject and a number of other important social issues will be discussed further at the World Summit for Social Development next year. The liberalization of the world economy, including the introduction of technology intensive methods of production and a shift to the services sector, have caused serious and seemingly intractable problems of unemployment, particularly in the industrialized countries. These technological changes have also meant a loss of comparative advantage for developing countries in labour-intensive production processes, thus affecting a number of their traditional exports, particularly in agriculture and manufacturing.

Apart from the problem of unemployment associated with technological change and general recession, there is a subtle pressure from some industrialized countries to compel the developing countries to raise existing labour standards, particularly in the area of wages. It is acknowledged that labour standards and workers' rights are critical issues in developing countries, involving the fair distribution of development benefits and social justice. Hence, the fight for better wages and working conditions is a legitimate one. However, it should be realized that the low wages paid to workers in the non-industrialized countries are mainly due to the prevailing low levels of income and living standards of their general population, the majority of which lives and works in the rural agricultural sector. Imposing higher standards which do not correspond to the level of economic development and growth of a particular country may prove untenable.

However, such flexibility should not imply laxity in making genuine efforts to implement the existing standards in accordance with the prevailing conditions in each country. For example the International Labour Organization should continue to promote the rights of the child. This should include the strengthening of the ILO's established standards on child labour.

It is therefore advisable for the ILO to continue its mandate of working with the governments, workers' unions and public organizations in the usual tripartite practice, with a view to improving working conditions, including measures to upgrade wages, social security, and terms of employment.

It is clear from the aforesaid that the improvement of workers' conditions is intrinsically related to economic growth. In this regard, we are deeply concerned about the retrogression in the economic and social plight of the least developed countries. In particular, the economic situation in the African LDCs has continued to deteriorate, with virtually all the major economic indicators reflecting poor performance. The export receipts from primary commodities continue to fall and the debt burden is increasing. These countries need urgent assistance in their search for more effective mobilization of domestic and external resources for their development.

It remains a fact that the global economy has registered very little success, if any at all, in improving social justice, not only in Tanzania but also in most developing countries. This fact has been aggravated by economic policies that have been deliberately designed to exclude from their ambits the social costs entailed in their application.

These economic policies, otherwise known as structural adjustment programmes, have created a climate of economic recession wherever they have been applied, and escalating social inequality which is the source of so many conflicts and frictions among our social groups.

It is opportune at this juncture for the ILO to pursue its responsibility of examining and considering with more vigour all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of the fundamental objective of social justice. For no form of social adherence can be expected from citizens for a public programme of economic and social restructuring if such a programme does not respond to their social aspirations, and contribute to the improvement of the whole community. This objective is fully acknowledged in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

In this regard it would be necessary for the Director-General of the ILO to pursue closer collaboration with the Bretten Woods institutions in the immediate future in making the Declaration of Philadelphia a reality. Otherwise there is the risk of many poor countries, especially in the Sub-Saharan Africa, being increasingly relegated to the fringes of the world economy.

It has often been argued that the negative impact of current structural adjustment policies on our fragile economies and citizens is due to the limited participation, if any, of those directly affected. Moreover, it is a universal truism that the restructuring of the economic and social apparatus amongst our countries so as to meet today's challenges of development, debt, balance of payments, employment, cannot rise out of a single economic policy measure to which a country can either adhere or not adhere.

We welcome the agenda item regarding safety and health in mines for its objective of protecting miners in this risky business. Tanzania is no exception in as far as the calamities in the mining sector are concerned.

As pointed out in the Director-General's Report, the world has been transformed from a situation in which the State was in charge, overall, of economic activities. Tanzania has swum with this tide and in this sense we have embarked on a programme in which the private sector is given a more prominent role.

To conclude, greater official development assistance should be channelled through the United Nations system. The ILO has provided the forum where many prominent thinkers of our time have launched innovative and constructive ideas on how the world of work could further be improved.

My delegation therefore looks forward to a closer cooperation with the ILO in its endeavours to carry out its mandate as stipulated, inter alia, in its Constitution, the Declaration of Philadephia and various Conference resolutions.

The PRESIDENT – We now resume our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Russian: Mr. KRAVCHENKO (Government delegate, Tajikistan) – First of all, on behalf of the Republic of Tajikistan, I would like to congratulate the President on his election to this lofty post. We would like to express our gratitude to the leaders of the United Nations and the ILO, and personally to Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the possibility given to our delegation to attend and to speak at this 81st Session of the Conference of the ILO.

The Republic of Tajikistan, with rich natural resources and raw materials and an inexpensive labour force, is attracting the attention of many foreign countries.

At the same time, in view of its high level of demographic growth and the dismissal of workers as a result of the transition to a market economy, the republic is facing difficulties in providing jobs for the population. This also slows the country's economic development.

The legacy of the past division of labour in the former USSR has meant that Tajikistan, which was basically a supplier of raw materials, has been disadvantaged in starting up a market economy in comparison with other countries in the region.

This situation has been aggravated by natural disasters, civil war and the presence of large numbers of refugees.

The civil war in Tajikistan killed tens of thousands of people and displaced about 700,000 inside the Republic and more than 100,000 in other countries. A great many specialists and workers left the country. In the last two years alone about 80,000 skilled specialists have emigrated.

Supervisory staff are still being trained for a limited number of badly-needed occupations, but the training is far from consistent with international standard.

Without the help of international intermediaries, we are bound to encounter serious problems. We do not have enough experience and knowledge of international standards and rules.

We need time to establish a basis not only for new economic relations, but also for a new class of businessmen with an entrepreneurial way of thinking.

The Republic has drafted a concept and programme for the economic transfer to a socially-oriented market economy. The legal basis and infrastructure are now being established.

But any beginning is a difficult time. In the past, the "great silk road" united many countries of the region. The transfer to a market economy is not a silk road; it is in fact quite a rocky one. After all, socially oriented economics cannot be limited in time or space.

Our leader declared from the rostrum at the United Nations that the Republic of Tajikistan has, true to its Constitution, committed itself to being a democratic, non-sectarian state with a socially oriented economy.

In 1991 we adopted an Act on employment. This gives some social guarantees to the unemployment and establishes the principle of a fund for employment. The Government has drafted an employment programme.

While trying to solve internal problems, we are now also studying the international labour market.

Directors and staff of the Ministry of Labour have been sent to participate in a number of international events held by the ILO and the IOM in Geneva and in Turkey, Italy, Poland and other countries.

In the autumn we will discuss unemployment and current questions relating to the export of labour resources at a special international seminar to be held with ILO participation.

An analysis of the international labour market has shown that we can count on Arab countries in the Gulf for cooperation in employment and the export of our labour resources.

The Ministry has established working contacts with embassies and missions in Dushanbe, and in particular with those of Russia, the United States, Turkey, Germany, Iran and others, to discuss mutually beneficial cooperation, including the occupational training of our youth in accordance with international standards and their subsequent export to other countries.

The Republic of Tajikistan counts on obtaining assistance from the ILO in order to make access to the foreign markets possible.

The present political, social and economic situation in the country has become interlinked with the interests of other countries, not only in Asia but also on other continents. We are on the dividing line between religious fundamentalism and the basis of non-sectarian government. The scope of our problems goes well beyond our borders. They affect the whole world.

We can only state that if these problems are not solved we could face a major catastrophe even greater than the ones in both Karabakh and Yugoslavia.

At the same time, if we solve these problems, together with you, including the problem of employment, we will demonstrate the importance and the role of international organizations in maintaining peace to the international community, to the new generation, and to the independent States of our planet.

For our Republic, admission to the ILO was an event of great importance. We have now begun ratifying Conventions and Recommendations, and we have started bringing our legislation into line with them.

Along this road we have committed many errors and we have many shortcomings. But with the wealth of the ILO's experience we hope to overcome these difficulties.

Tajikistan urgently requires the help of the international community and the ILO in particular to deal with the following: the establishment of training centres for supervisory staff capable of working in a market environment, and above all for the training of directors of enterprises and of government public servants. They need training in computer technology and financial and banking matters; the establishment of inter-regional employment programmes and the creation of jobs for the unemployed and for returnees and refugees, and assistance in implementing the "self-employment" programme; the establishment of social protection programmes for especially vulnerable groups such as mothers with numerous children, pensioners, the elderly and students; and assistance in exporting Tajikistan's workforce onto the international labour market.

We are fervently hoping that the ILO will establish a representative body in central Asia. This will undoubtedly make it possible to solve labour problems in the region in a more functional manner, in particular in the Republic of Tajikistan.

Bearing in mind the difficult economic situation of the Republic of Tajikistan, we would like to call on member States of the International Labour Organization to become donors and to pay our initial and subsequent contributions for the first two to four years.

We are convinced that the emergency of our Republic from the serious economic crisis will be possible through the experience of and cooperation with many developed countries and various international organizations, and the International Labour Organization in particular.

Original Azeri: Mr. AGAMALY (Acting Minister of Labour and Social Protection of the Population, Azerbaijan) – On behalf of the Republic of Azerbaijan, I am honoured to congratulate all the member States of the ILO on this great event, the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, and express my hope for the success of the work of this session.

At the moment we are rethinking and reassessing many principles which seemed so entrenched a short time ago concerning the present, past and future of the social life of mankind. In these conditions the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, is particularly relevant to today and to the future. The new concept for development and the new policy of the ILO seem to be in line with these changes which have been taking place in the international community over the last few years.

These changes require major efforts at all levels. The Republic of Azerbaijan has opted for a democratic system and a market economy based primarily on the principles of social justice. In this connection, the new thrust of the ILO is as never before close to and important for us. The solution of many existing problems and of those which have cropped up as a result of economic reforms of social problems is the area in which to step up cooperation with the ILO.

Over a period of more than two years of cooperation between the Republic of Azerbaijan and the ILO, we have signed seven basic ILO Conventions relating to human rights and whose provisións have formed the basis of new legislative instruments on labour, labour relations and employment. Many draft texts have been checked by the ILO, and the leaders of various departments and technical experts of the Organization have visited the Republic and become acquainted with the situation on the ground and shared their experience and knowledge with us in order to solve social and labour problems. As a result of these meetings a protocol on technical assistance to the Republic has been concluded to help improve the system of labour statistics.

With the help of material assistance from the ILO, we are at the moment translating the 54 Conventions and 32 Recommendations we have ratified into the Azeri language so that we can then publish them in a handbook.

In the area of mutual relations with the ILO, of particular importance is assistance in improving the qualifications of specialists through courses, seminars and special practical training periods in the Turin Centre, and elsewhere.

However, we hope that on the basis of active partnership the ILO will be able to provide further effective technical assistance to Azerbaijan. This desire is related above all to the fact that the Republic of Azerbaijan is the only country of the international community which is implementing political and economic reforms against the backdrop of a six-year aggression waged against us by Armenia. Mr. Michel Hansenne underlined the fact in his Report that the changes going on in the international community can indeed give rise to an outbreak of regional conflicts.

As a result of the war to which I refer, more than 20 per cent of Azerbaijan's territory has been occupied and approximately 1 million people, mostly elderly people, women and children, have been forced to flee from various cities and villages of the Republic to areas where war is not being waged.

The PRESIDENT – May I ask the speaker please to stick to the topics that are under discussion. This is not one of them.

Original Azeri: Mr. AGAMALY – In these conditions Azerbaijan is implementing social and economic reforms and is trying to find the best possible model for its social structure. The transition to a market economy means major changes in the mechanisms of employment and causes many social problems, to solve which we must find a new approach to defining state social policy. There is now a need to create a new economic, legal and organization mechanism capable of motivating the people and helping them to become involved in socially-useful activity and then redistributing them throughout the national economy in a way which will provide economically and socially effective employment for the population, and correspond with the changes in nature of a relationship to property, economic mechanisms and management. Particular importance is being accorded to the preparation of a new employment policy and the mechanisms for its implementation.

This is based on the fact that, as a result of the reform of employment relationships, a very difficult situation faces Azerbaijan at the moment. More than 600,000 members of the economically active population are unemployed, the vast proportion of whom are women and young people. The sectoral structure of set up by employment in the former USSR is no longer rational and has been the cause of a lengthy period of stagnation. Our new employment policy is directed primarily at achieving productive employment, which is the prerequisite for us to find a way out of the economic crisis.

An analysis of the social processes occurring in our Republic shows that during the transition to a market economy social problems are being exacerbated. The living standard of the most vulnerable groups in the population including elderly people, large families and the disabled has worsened. We have a situation whereby increases in the cost of living outweigh any increase in income for most of the population.

At present the State is preparing a package of legislative instruments which should provide basic social and labour rights to all citizens. National legislation on the social system is constantly being developed and is gradually extending coverage to new situations and new sectors of the population, to achieve its aim of universal coverage.

Drastic changes in and improvement of the economic situation in Azerbaijan is the basis for development and building a social system. We are trying to take all possible measures to improve the social and economic situation of the country and solve the financial problems related to offering social protection to the population. However, war, together with the transition to a market economy, greatly complicates the attempt to solve these problems.

In the search for an optimum social instrument to reflect the needs of the population of Azerbaijan, we are trying to use the experience of the countries with developed market economies. We hope this will work.

Original French: Mrs. OSSENI (Government delegate, Benin) – I have great pleasure in joining in the tributes which have already been paid to the President upon his brilliant election to steer the deliberations of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. On behalf of the Government of my country, the Republic of Benin, and on behalf of the delegation which I have the honour of heading at this Conference – and on my own behalf would like to extend to him and to the Officers of this Conference my warm congratulations. I am quite certain that under their enlightened guidance our work will be crowned with success.

We meet once again, as we do every year, to reflect together upon the serious problems with which humanity is confronted in the fields of labour, the application of standards, social security, employment, trade union rights, freedom of association and labour.

As is our tradition, and in accordance with the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Director-General of the International Labour Office has submitted for our benefit an excellent Report entitled Defending values, promoting change.

I would like to thank him for the very relevant analysis he has made in this Report and congratulate him upon his attachment to this Organization in pursuit of peace and social progress throughout the world.

The choice of the theme for the Director-General's Report is in perfect harmony with the objectives underlying the celebrations to mark the 75th anniversary of the inception of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

A fresh look at international labour standards, the disappearance of the communist bloc, the globalization of the economy, the appearance of new inequalities, tripartism and social justice as values to be preserved, the role of the ILO on the international scene today and tomorrow – all these are crucial points raised and analysed in the Report by the Director-General of the ILO.

I agree with all the opinions set out in this Report. However, I believe that after 75 years of work, the time has come for the main protagonists in the life of this Organization to pause and look back over the past in order to be able to confront the future with determination and hope.

Indeed, the activities so painstakingly developed by the ILO, including the programmes and strategies for technical cooperation, are worthy of the interest and praise of all persons who are anxious to promote the well-being of human beings and nations, as well as the universal good embodied by our Organization.

Faced with this new challenge, this Organization of ours must stand firm and robust to avoid being swallowed up by the waves of the international political crisis which besets us.

The Organization must draw strength from its universality, its competence and its ability to take on board many divergent tendencies and turn them into the genuine expression of the world's social conscience.

As far as I am concerned, the task at hand is not only to transform international economic relations so that social progress may be preserved in spite of the globalization of the economy, but – and above all – to strive for the common good of mankind; in other words, we must reject privileges and fundamental inequalities.

If we take this as a premise, the cooperation between ILO member States becomes of prime importance.

This cooperation is necessary – even vital – to the extent that it not only allows countries in the process of democratization to take up the challenge but also to develop a new concept of development based on collective self-sufficiency to change the lives of millions of men, women and children, now suffering because of war, poverty and hunger.

In addition to our celebrations to mark the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, these are the new terms in which we must see the social equation.

In other words, has the ILO finished battling against racial discrimination, has it finished standing up for minorities, freedom of expression and freedom of association?

Have we found an appropriate legal framework to control the exploitation of children and adolescents in factories and in regional and ethnic conflicts?

Has the rule of law, for which we all yearn, already been achieved? How will the developing countries, especially the African countries, be able to solve the problems of employment for young graduates, the civil servants who have left public service and social marginalization, when they are confronted with the burden of debt and the globalization of the economy?

More than ever today we must take up the challenge, in these times of deep crisis, to give hope to coming generations.

And that is why the problem of employment must be one of the main lines of endeavour within this Organization.

National and international strategies, as well as the classical tools for analysing the labour market, have to be rethought; for there can be no lasting development, no genuine economic growth, as long as the main tendency in the labour market is that supply and demand are out of kilter.

In this context, I should like to mention that my country felt it appropriate to organize a national employment forum from 31 May to 2 June 1994. The conclusions drawn at this forum, which brought together representatives of the Administration, employers, workers, non-governmental organizations and the international institutions with offices in Benin, will be put to good use.

Confronted with the extent of this problem, Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, at the time Minister for Employment and Labour in Belgium, was moved to say at the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference on Tuesday, 19 June 1984: "The employment crisis is a crisis within a crisis"; and he went on to say that "economic revival, however vigorous, will never in itself have enough impact on industrial activity to guarantee work to all those seeking it in the years ahead".

I believe that his reflections are still very topical. That is why, in the light of what I have just said, I would suggest that the international community adopt a global approach and focus all its technical and financial support on the primacy of technical and vocational training rather than a conventional educational system, which is no longer adapted to current and future needs in the labour market, in particular in developing countries, and more specifically in the African countries.

Similarly, the ILO should conduct more thorough studies on the factors which impede independent employment and self-employment and also study the reasons for the failure of production and service cooperatives in most of the African countries.

It is important to stress in this context that regional centres for labour administration be given greater financial and technical resources so that they can perform their role of research and vocational training centres.

Apart from these measures, I belong to the school of thought of those who believe that tripartism as an intrinsic value, should not only be preserved but further consolidated, as it is the unique driving force within this Organization.

None of these measures, however, can work without political stability in our countries where social consensus must be the cornerstone of democracy.

Although we need the press to serve as a link between the rulers in our countries and the general public, it must revert to ethical methods if it is to serve the cause of development in our different countries.

I should like to take this opportunity once again, to thank the Director-General of the ILO and his staff and experts for the technical and financial assistance which has been extended to my country over the past three years in the field of labour administration, employment, vocational training, social security and international labour standards.

Benin places very high hopes in the activities of ILO in pursuit of its noble objectives, that is to say peace and freedom.

These are a few of the thoughts which occurred to me when thinking about the future role of this Organization on the occasion of this double anniversary, celebrated on 1 June 1994 in my country.

I am convinced that the ILO will find ways of accommodating all these concerns in its programme of action and will continue to promote peace and social justice for the benefit of mankind.

Mr. JONZON (Government delegate, Sweden) – On behalf of my entire delegation I want to congratulate the President and the other Officers upon their election.

The world of work has changed profoundly since the ILO was established, and perhaps even since the beginning of the current decade. The speed of change is increasing.

Globalization and technological processes, rising competition and powerful market forces are impacting on jobs and work organization, and on the entire institutional framework in our economies, be it legislation policy, institutional relations and security arrangements.

While all these changes promise greater efficiency, higher growth, employment creation, and ultimately enhanced social welfare, it will not happen automatically.

In addition, these processes lead to new forms of – and risks for – social vulnerability and exclusion, and they threaten to widen even further the gap between the rich and the poor – people and nations.

These are new challenges for the ILO and for its constituents – and we must all be able to adapt existing paradigms in accordance with new realities.

The ILO has a clear and important new role to play in the international arena to respond to these changes. Therefore, the Office – but also you and I as participants in the Conference and the Governing Body – have a responsibility to define and to design this new role. We have to ask ourselves: can the ILO can play this role with its present structure? Is the direction right? Are the methods and procedures the most relevant ones?

But the new role has to be based upon the major principles which always have been the foundation of the Organization. And here I refer to workers' basic rights; tripartism; justice; equality and solidarity.

How do we translate these values into social reality?

The driving forces behind the changes make it clear that we must find mechanisms for increased cooperation between the ILO and the international bodies dealing with economic, financial and trade policies, in order to create the integrated and coherent policy framework and approach necessary to be able to assist vulnerable groups of people and vulnerable nations. The Social Summit is a crucial event to reach this purpose, and the responsibility lies mainly with governments.

We need also to adapt and to reinforce the institutional framework for ensuring social justice, which will have an impact on standard-setting, on our discussions and efforts regarding standards and development, the social clause, human rights and poverty, etc.

Human rights are not to be seen in a legal context only. Human rights are a powerful force for development, for reducing poverty and empowering the poor. In fact, they are a precondition for making growth benefit the poor, and for education and social policies to take real effect.

I will raise a few further issues where reforms perhaps are possible, and I begin with standards-related matters.

This year's Report of the Director-General calls for a more rigorous procedure for the choice of subjects for new standards, for more emphasis on the evaluation of existing standards, and for efforts to improve compliance with Conventions relating to fundamental rights. My delegation fully supports these considerations.

I would like to add a few practical things only.

When texts are discussed in Conference Committee, controversial issues – often due to time constraints – are put to the vote; in view of the rules, this provides scope for strategic manoeuvring. Then the near-stochastic nature of majorities can lead to inconsistencies, mixture of principles, details and exceptions making the final instrument weak and hard to monitor. A bulldozed party feels no commitment to implementation. Ballot victories can prove pyrrhic.

Therefore, to the extent possible, we should try to avoid votes in Conference Committees; but if we have to vote, delegates should be informed of the real consequences of the voting and of the voting rules.

The simplified voting procedure I suggested some years ago has begun to be implemented, but a more consistent application on simple matters would give time for more thorough discussions on crucial questions.

Most important though, is that there must be an opportunity for thoroughly pondering the meaning, implications and interpretations of instruments before they are finally adopted. Therefore, a third year's processing should be considered.

We are highly sceptical of the idea of a "soft law". The status of various documents, other than the instruments, is already hard enough to pin down.

Also related to standards is the issue of trade and fair competition. We have to make sure that measures considered in this context will have the desired practical results, because good intentions do not always have good consequences.

We also have to reflect on the implications of allowing other bodies, which are not tripartite and which have other priorities, to gain influence over ILO standards. Will our standards be strengthened or weakened?

It is important that the ILO takes its own stand before others – organizations or ministries – confront us with a fait accompli, and the thoughts of the Director-General therefore merit consideration.

My second subject area concerns the work of the Office.

All I can do as an outsider is to give vent to a feeling I have, and to point to opportunities for improvements – should any be needed. And the reason is that I support and care for the ILO.

To my delegation, the organization structure, administration and management functions of the Office seem old fashioned. Meanwhile, the staff are being called upon to intervene in more and more areas with dwindling resources.

The personnel is the main asset of the ILO, and the return on that asset depends on its competence, but even more so on the way in which the capability is used, and the team spirit. Leadership is not decision-making hierarchies or reporting channels. Results cannot be obtained to order.

To make full use of the ILO's resources, the Office must be allowed to work with greater autonomy, liberty and with more scope for developing even controversial ideas which may be contrary to prevailing paradigms.

Not doing so, would be a denial of all the knowledge and experience present within the Office, and could condemn the ILO to impotence. The development of an original analysis of outstandingly complex economic and social problems demands bold new approaches, powers of initiative, confidence and the right to make mistakes.

A position as centre of excellence is not to be had for the asking. It can only be gained through competence and results and – something not to be forgotten – through the marketing of these. However, a change of focus will make new demands on the staff, and to some extent even require different people. These are very difficult questions, but they have to be faced. Much responsibility devolves also on the Conference and the Governing Body. And that is my third point. The marshalling of details, that at present often characterizes the budgeting process, seems somewhat inefficient. The focus of endeavour seems sometimes to be more on one's own share, than on the complete fabric, making the calls for action as dubiously efficacious as a rain dance. The Governing Body ought to be concerned even more with objectives, principles and guidelines, and with making demands and following up performance and expenditure. It is time also to consider the question: how to improve the technical substance in the work of the Governing Body, and in particular in its committees, and to find the innovative mechanisms to address – in a substantive way – the new world economic problems and the growing interconnection between various policy fields. When it comes to the application of standards, a specific Committee of Experts examines the cases and makes recommendations before they are brought to the Conference Committee. Perhaps that is a direction worth considering.

Finally, the developed and the developing worlds share many problems and challenges and it is a tragedy to note that mass murder and genocide have not come to an end. Now as ever, extreme political movements exploit miserable situations and offer seductively easy answers. Everything is the fault of the others – most of the time minorities or foreigners. If we together can create a new vision – something young people can get enthusiastic about – we might, through the ILO, be able to make human rights the ideology of the next century.

Mr. WITBOOI (Minister, Labour and Human Resources Development, Namibia) – Allow me to join the previous speakers in extending, on behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, heartfelt congratulations to the President and Vice-Presidents on their election to steer the work of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

This 81st Session is indeed a historic occasion because this year we are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Philadelphia Declaration. I therefore take this opportunity to congratulate the ILO on the memorable occasion of its 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

My delegation has noted that the Report of the Director-General to the Conference entitled Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda, is indeed very topical and relevant. We find the Report both proactive and thought-provoking. It surely forms the basis for further fruitful discussions.

Today, the world is experiencing twin problems of unemployment and poverty. Formal employment in Namibia is incapable of accommodating new entrants to the labour market due to the poor economic growth and the lack of required skills. Having said that, Namibia in its fourth year of independence for all practical reasons relies on the ILO's technical assistance programmes, especially in the field of human resources development and sectoral activities, including the development of our labour market information system. Connected with this is the ever-increasing cost of living and decline in living standards in general, which is indeed a challenge to all of us. As correctly stated in the Philadephia Declaration, this constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere.

It is against this background that we should defend our values and promote change for the better. In this context, I refer to the positive changes taking place in our southern African subregion, particularly after the liberation and democratization of Namibia; the potential positive changes in Mozambique and even the recent changes of multiparty democratic general elections in Malawi; and more importantly the eradication of apartheid and the establishment of a non-racial democratic South Africa, are a most promising catalyst of positive change. It is only in Angola where very slow progress is being made in this war-torn country, burdened with the loss of life of innocent civilians and destruction of social and economic infrastructure.

In light of the above, we believe that the promotion of social justice in a global economy always has been an agenda item of the ILO. I therefore call upon all Members here to do their utmost to promote peace, democracy and social justice in every small way possible so that Africa and the world may once again experience the true taste of freedom and prosperity.

Social justice is always a focal point in Namibia and it is reflected in the changes our Government has made since independence. Although the Namibian Constitution is applauded as one of the most democratic and liberal constitutions in the world, our labour legislation has gone further in promoting and strengthening the spirit of tripartism, freedom of association and collective bargaining. That is why the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia is the basis of our discussion this year, enabling us to take stock of our past activities and streamline new strategies for the future.

Furthermore, our Government's efforts to uphold the democratic process appear to be working satisfactorily. Our parliamentary system is effectively functioning though government agencies have the right to initiate policy formulation in their field of competence. Thus the Labour and Human Resources Ministry in collaboration with social partners helped the Labour Act to be promulgated. It provides for the Labour Advisory Council, which is now fully functioning, while the Labour Court and district labour courts are fully functioning on a tripartite basis. All these achievements have come as a result of assistance from the International Labour Office.

Some of the critical issues confronting Namibia today are the following: firstly, the extent to which it can preserve and stabilize its much-praised democratic process and the truly transparent Government; secondly, the issue of the extreme inequality in the living standards and opportunities for employment and income that exist between different social groups in our society; thirdly, the frightening situation of unemployment; fourthly, people with high expectations for radical and rapid social change in the distribution of income, wealth, land, etc.

I would fail in my duty if I did not use this opportunity to hail the positive changes which have taken place in South Africa. In this connection I must also express my deepest gratitude for the part the ILO's Committee on Apartheid played in dismantling apartheid in South Africa. At the same time, we heartily welcome the non-racial democratic South Africa to resume her seat amongst the democratic family of the ILO.

Allow me to make a few remarks about the African Regional Labour Administration Centre (ARLAC) which is an autonomous regional body, comprised of governments of English-speaking African countries and has as its objectives to provide the following: training in labour administration; consultancy and advisory services; to carry out studies and research and publication of research findings; industrial relations, including social security, workers' education and assistance to employers' organizations. As an institution, ARLAC supplements and strengthens the functions and services of the ILO in Africa.

Having said that, though we are acutely aware of the budgetary constraints of the ILO, we believe that ARLAC is beneficial to member States of our region and I therefore solicit the continued technical and financial support of the International Labour Office in order to strengthen the technical capacity of ARLAC.

With these few words I would like to conclude by expressing my appreciation for this opportunity to address this august House. I also offer my warmest thanks on behalf of my Government for the continued technical assistance provided by the ILO to our young nation in particular, and the sub-region in general.

It is indeed true that tripartism has a major role among ILO constituents. In fact, sound labour relations and increased productivity are prerequisites for economic growth and socio-economic advancement of our people, particularly disadvantaged groups such as women, disabled persons and children. With this in mind, I wish this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference a major success and look forward to an expansion and continuation of our usual good relationship, cooperation and friendship in the future.

Long live peace, friendship and solidarity among the nations of the world.

Mr. MAUNG (Workers' delegate, Myanmar) – It is my great honour and pleasure to have the opportunity to make this statement at this auspicious 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. This Conference is opportune to commemorate the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

In particular, I would like to convey my heartfelt congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to the presidency. I have every confidence that his able guidance and leadership will positively influence on the success of this august assembly.

I would like to take this opportunity to praise the Governing Body and the Director-General for their fine and comprehensive Reports which include very encouraging and valuable proposals. Moreover, the Director-General is to be commended for his frank views and his courage to analyze critically the various situations currently challenging the Organization. Unexpected drastic changes have taken place in the world during the past few years and the Director-General has therefore paved the way to explore necessary improvements and changes, both in the strategy and tactics of the Organization. I am hopeful that this Conference will be able to embark upon these important issues by laying down future programmes.

Myanmar regained her independence on 4 January 1948 and promptly joined the Organization in the same year, she has thus been a Member for over 46 years. During this time Myanmar has experienced different political, economic and social environments.

In the early days of independence, the system of parliamentary democracy was in place along with capitalist economic structures under which Myanmar workers were given the right to freedom of association and the right to organize. These fundamental rights of workers had been misused by some political parties and politicians, and the workers' organizations in those days were cleverly manipulated by the political parties for their own political ends. The unity among workers that prevailed during the time of the national struggle for independence faded away and confrontation developed among birds of the same feather on the basis of personality, religion, political belief and partisan spirit. The workers therefore lost their opportunity to work together for the national good.

Several years passed and by 1962 the Union had come to the brink of disintegration due to the self-centred motives of the political parties. Hence, the nation resorted to a one-party political system combined with socialist economic practices. Under this system, unity among unionists, including workers and peasants, was re-established. Both workers and peasants enjoyed the right to organize for their own well-being under the umbrella of the respective central body.

In 1988, having experienced the one-party system for over two decades, people showed their aspirations for a multi-party democratic system. Since then, the State Law and Order Restoration Council has been shouldering state responsibilities and striving for the three main national causes, namely: non-disintegration of the unions; non-disintegration of national solidarity; consolidation of national sovereignty. In response to the aspirations of the people, efforts have been made towards the establishment of a new political and economic framework for Myanmar. The national Convention is now being convened to adopt basic principles for framing the new State Constitution. Workers' delegates are actively participating as a separate group in the national Convention. Thanks to the strenuous efforts of 700 delegates of different strata, a total of 104 basic principles for the new Constitution have recently been adopted. There have been clear indications for the protection of workers' rights and privileges in the coming new democratic State to which we aspire. Hence, there shall be no doubt of new developments in the field of labour with the emergence of the new State Constitution.

Even at this juncture, with the drafting of the new Constitution still under way, Myanmar workers are being well protected by the present Government. The privileges of the workers prescribed under the existing labour laws are not inferior to those of the international labour standards. In fact, this is a time of transition and yet the present Government has provided the right of association to the extent that workers' welfare associations have been formed in various industries and establishments. Matters concerning workers are being coordinated between workers' representatives and management. In addition, there are also several professional and art and craft associations which are now functioning well in Myanmar. We are, therefore, fully confident that the right to freedom of association will prevail in a much broader sense in the near future as prescribed under the new State Constitution.

We the workers are the basic resource for national development and we must therefore be vigilant that our actions will not hinder the momentum of national development endeavours. In this regard, past experiences should be taken into consideration as valuable lessons for our present and future actions. It is our firm belief that the status and quality of life of the entire workforce will be fully achieved only when the State becomes stable, peaceful and prosperous. As the Myanmar saying goes: "The elegance of the lotus is proportionate to the rise of the water level in the pond". We therefore reaffirm our determination to render full support for all national development endeavours in Myanmar.

In conclusion, I should like to sincerely wish this Conference every success.

Original Arabic: Mr. DJEMAM (Representative, International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should first like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents and to thank the Director-General, the Governing Body and the staff of this Organization who have again presented us with a Report which shows us clearly the path we have to follow, whether our views concur or differ.

This session coincides with the 75th anniversary of the setting up of the first international tripartite Organization, the first Organization established in response to the bitter struggle waged by the working class and which has now become a forum for dialogue between the social partners.

This Organization has defended such basic workers' rights as freedom of association and collective bargaining, has promoted tripartite consultations and has spearheaded the struggle against discrimination and forced labour. It has thus defended democracy and human rights, in particular, freedom of association which has been denied in many countries, giving rise to domestic strife in the form of violence, terrorism, murder and retrogression in all aspects of life.

The ILO has played an important role in drawing attention to the concerns and aspirations of workers. The discussions that have taken place here have dealt with the problems of all social groups, but we still feel that the ILO should give priority to the development of tripartism, going beyond consultations on standard-setting to discuss all aspects of life, also at the national level, so that workers are given a major role in decision-making on matters relating to their own lives and those of future generations. We need to establish an appropriate framework with a view to compelling governments to respect international standards and workers' rights, enhancing the means at their disposal in recognition of their contribution to the progress of mankind.

I shall not review the content of the Director-General's Report or the document issued by the Workers' group in the Governing Body, for we have all taken note of it and endorse its conclusions. We reaffirm our adherence to the principle of tripartite representation and our view that the ILO should be given the role and status it deserves in the various international bodies and that workers' representatives should also play a role in those bodies, particularly international bodies dealing with economic and social concerns.

We trust that the ILO will study the best way of achieving this aim. I should also like to state that the representatives of the trade union movement are determined to play a part in the World Summit for Social Development next year. We further hope that the workers will have a say in the World Trade Organization, which should not join the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank as a third promoter of a policy of subjugation of the peoples of the Third World.

At the beginning of this year our Confederation held its ninth conference in Tunisia under the slogan "Freedom, unity, development, democracy, social justice: the keywords of the Arab workers' struggle". The conference was attended by Arab organizations and high-level delegations representing Arab, regional and international bodies. It discussed a variety of trade union, social and economic topics and agreed to reinvigorate the trade union movement and to enhance its unity to achieve the goals it pursues. It was a forward-looking conference in which solidarity and unity prevailed, a labour conference working for progress, development, independence and democracy in the Arab trade union movement.

The conference gave special attention to human rights and freedom of association, which are still being violated in many Arab countries or are even nonexistent, and to the Arab trade union movement, democracy and all aspects of human rights, social justice and independent development in the Arab world. It decided to strengthen the Arab Centre for Trade Union Rights and Freedoms and published a charter of trade union rights and freedoms and economic and social demands for Arab workers.

The conference also decided to step up action in defence of immigrant workers within and outside the Arab world and attached considerable importance to the matter of working women.

The conference held lengthy discussions on international economic changes and their impact on the working class and its trade union movement. It stressed the importance of unity and solidarity in dealing with the onslaught of capitalism and with social collapse and the adverse impact of restructuring policies, privatization, the globalization of the economy and the undermining of the public sector.

After the international system that came into being following the Second World War dashed the hopes of so many peoples and after the upheavals in the world that have undermined ideas and beliefs, swept away regimes and alliances and led to imbalance in international relations, a new international order has emerged in which the West and capitalist institutions imposing harsh conditions reign supreme. As a result, there has been a widening of the gap between North and South, a worsening of unemployment, a slump in purchasing power, a massive increase in emigration, an increase in indebtedness and a succession of economic and social crises.

In this context, the Arab nation has in recent years been the scene of momentous events that have greatly harmed Arab workers and hundreds of thousands of foreign workers employed in Arab countries. The impact of the Gulf crisis and the embargo imposed on Iraq continue to weigh heavily on Iraqi workers and the embargo imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya compounds the problems and the harsh existence of Libyan workers. We call for a lifting of these unjust embargoes and we reaffirm the right of workers to live in peace in their countries.

It is naive to suppose that what is happening in the Arab world is the result of chance or some form of misunderstanding. It is actually the result of supremacist policies aimed at controlling world resources, subjugating peoples and seizing their wealth so that it can be used to serve the interests of the rich countries. The recently concluded GATT forms part of this policy, which seeks to promote consumption, open frontiers to the products of the major industrialized countries and escalate competition between the powerful and the weak.

In the course of our discussions with our fellow trade unionists of various persuasions and beliefs we have noted a desire to cooperate with the International Labour Office and to exercise solidarity with a view to meeting common challenges and a determination to prevent workers from having to pay the price of adverse change, from becoming a commodity in international trade and from bearing the brunt of the policies of big multinational monopolies. We have also noted a resolve to preserve basic human rights, the right to freedom, to democracy, to self-determination and to social justice, a commitment to defend trade union rights and freedoms and a devotion to the principles of the ILO, the spirit of its Constitution and the content of its Conventions.

We feel that there are major points of convergence that call for concerted efforts to establish an international trade union front based on solidarity and respect for the distinctive features of individual cultures.

We commend the activities of the ILO and its international standards, which are being violently attacked by some countries and some employers' organizations which resist all trends towards progress and development. We reaffirm the need for the Organization to continue providing technical assistance, specialized studies and technical advice and to pursue its defence of the freedom of association, putting pressure on the governments of certain Arab countries to end their breaches of trade union freedoms, human rights and workers' rights. We expect a great deal from the ILO and we aspire to wide-ranging cooperation with its organs, taking into account the needs of our regions and workers and the aims of the Organization.

We wish to thank the ILO and the Regional Office for the Arab States for their support for economic and social development in the Arab region and for the Arab trade union movement. We all hope that this cooperation will be intensified to meet the urgent and growing needs of our workers.

I should like to take this opportunity to extend greetings on behalf of all Arab workers to the workers and people of South Africa, whose struggle has been a fine example for the world as a whole, an example of sacrifice, devotion, self-denial and determination to secure respect for the principles of freedom, justice and equality.

Original Turkish: Mr. MERAL (Workers' delegate, Turkey) – At the outset of my speech as the Workers' delegate of Turkey, I congratulate the President on the occasion of his unanimous election to the chair of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference as a Workers' delegate. Knowing of his successful activities in the past and his vast experience, I believe that this year's Conference under his competent chairmanship will bear fruitful results for the workers, all the working people and our world. I greet with respect the new South African Government and the working people of South Africa who played the leading role in democratizing that country. I also welcome the countries of Oman, Turkmenistan and Tajikistan.

The world is going through a globalization process under the control, and in line with the interests, of capital. Inequalities among and within States are increasing every single day. Unemployment and poverty are spreading. The working peoples of the developing world live through these difficulties even more intensively, especially due to foreign debt and the austerity programmes imposed by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. The high rate of population increase further aggravates poverty and unemployment.

Today, we face a very systematic assault all around the world on protective labour legislation, the concept of the social welfare state and trade union rights and freedoms. Privatization, subcontracting, deregulation, precarious forms of employment and the requirement of "flexibility" in the implementation of ILO Conventions and domestic legislation are all practices and attempts aiming to increase the oppression on and the exploitation of the workers. The great transformation in the Central and Eastern European countries is presented as the success of the free market economy, and it is asserted that "the importance of the ILO has decreased with the fall of communism". It is democracy that has won in the Central and Eastern European countries. If this attack on workers' rights that has intensified with the termination of the Cold War continues, it is possible that new problems will arise. The precondition for social peace is the procurement of humane living and working conditions and of jobs for all working people. There can be no consensus and social peace in the absence of democracy, social justice, bread, peace and freedom.

I believe that this year's session of the Conference will emphasize once more the importance of the ILO Conventions and the supervisory mechanism in the eradication of poverty and the achievement of full employment and social justice. We do not agree with any "lax" legislation, which is in line with the "flexibility" requirements of the employers.

We hope that the resolutions to be adopted at this Conference under our able president will not be left only as words, that campaigns will be launched for their extensive ratification and implementation, that social clauses guaranteeing basic trade union rights and the rights of the working people will be included in international trade agreements, that the complaint mechanisms developed in case of the violation of the freedom of association will also be extended to other Conventions, as well. I also agree that the declaration of a World Charter of Workers' Rights would be appropriate.

The precondition for the realization of the ILO's ideals is peace. However, racism, spreading in various forms today, is the greatest enemy of peace. Racism is developing in the form of xenophobia in some European countries and in the form of promoting attempts to establish new States based on a specific race in some of the Middle Eastern countries or fuelling ethnic rivalries in many regions.

Within this context, we regret that our citizens who have settled in European countries, whose respect for human rights is above controversy, face treatment as second-class humans. We hope that the ILO will accept international instruments that would guarantee basic civil rights to migrant workers who have resided and worked in a host country for more than a specific period of time.

Whatever the motive might be, terror and all other forms of force and oppression are enemies of democracy, and are being used as pretexts to destroy democracy, trade union rights and freedoms and the rights of the working people. We are sure that all countries that believe in democracy will take action, being conscious of the fact that various separatist organizations committing acts of terror in Turkey are enemies of democracy.

The precondition for democracy is secularism. I would also like to draw your attention to the dangers for democracy, the rights of working people and trade union rights and freedoms to be perceived in the strengthening of anti-secular tendencies in various countries.

At a time when the Cold War is over and the hopes of humanity for lasting peace have strengthened, the insufficiencies of the United Nations in the face of the inhuman massacres continuing in Bosnia and Herzegovina for years, and the attacks on Azerbaijan, are worth consideration and are sources of regret.

In Turkey, the problems of the working people have been further aggravated by the new austerity programme.

This new austerity programme that was prepared solely in accordance with the request of, and in line with, the interests of the International Monetary Fund and the employers in our country, without previous consultation with the trade unions, is anti-democratic, and it aims to put the main burden of the crisis on the working people.

There was no consultation with the trade unions in establishing the new austerity programme. The Republic of Turkey continuously violates Conventions Nos. 2, 26, 81, 88, 94, 95, 100, 105, 111 and 122.

The 1982 Constitution and the legislation promulgated in the military period, and its aftermath as a whole, violate Convention No. 98, especially the restrictions and prohibitions on the right of public employees to bargain collectively and to strike. These are still in force.

Public employees face administrative obstacles, anti-union discrimination and various forms of oppression when they exercise their most basic democratic and trade union rights.

We live with great regret in a situation in which trade unionists are being taken into custody, arrested and even deprived of their trade union rights, and by being convicted as a consequence of the preservation of the anti-democratic legislation in Turkey.

Conventions Nos. 59, 87, 135, 142, 144 and 151, which will enter within the scope of the supervisory functions of the ILO on 12 July 1994, are also being violated.

The amendments envisaged in the Turkish Trade Unions Act and the Act concerning Collective Labour Agreements, Strikes and Lock-outs do not have the content and the scope to eradicate the traces of military rule and to bring the legislation into harmony with the international standards.

As a radical solution to this problem, I propose bringing the labour legislation in Turkey as a whole into line with Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 151, with the technical assistance of the ILO.

Our Government is also attempting to evade some of the economic obligations of collective agreements.

In the case of the continuation of these violations, TÜRK-ISË, (the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions), while continuing its legitimate and democratic struggle at home, will also take the necessary steps at the ILO.

Original French: Mr. OGBAMI (Government delegate, Central African Republic) – It is a great honour and a privilege for me to take the floor following the distinguished delegates who preceded me.

From this rostrum, my first thought goes to the Swiss people, and in particular to the population of the Canton of Geneva. I would like to acknowledge their warm hospitality and thank them for being our hosts in this land of gatherings where men and women who contribute to the promotion of social justice in the world can meet. That is the central objective of the ILO, the 75th anniversary of which we are celebrating this year.

On behalf of the Central African people and of His Excellency, Mr. Ange-Félix Patassé, the President of the Republic and Head of State democratically elected on 27 September 1993, I address my warm greetings to the distinguished delegates present at this session of our Organization's Conference.

On behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, it is a great pleasure for me to present my warm congratulations to Mr. Charles Gray on his brilliant election to the presidency of the 1994 Session of the International Labour Conference.

I also congratulate the two Vice-Presidents, whose invaluable assistance will help us fulfil our expectations and ensure the full success of our work.

The re-election of the Director-General to head the International Labour Office bears witness to his deep commitment to the ideals of our venerable Organization and to the mission which its founding fathers assigned to it in 1919; a mission supplemented and enhanced by the Declaration of Philadelphia in 1944.

So on this special occasion I would like on behalf of my delegation to extend to him and to his staff my congratulations for your extremely valuable Report, which calls upon all the constituents of the ILO to reflect conscientiously on the new responsibilities which we will have to assume tomorrow.

Two major events in the life of our Organization give us the opportunity to celebrate two events this year: the 75th anniversary of the ILO, set up in 1919 following the First World War, and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, adopted just before the Second World War came to an end.

In addition to these great events in the life of our Organization, we should add another in 1963, when the ILO showed its desire to adapt to the evolution taking place in the world. This moment was marked by the consolidation of the communist bloc and an anti-colonial revolution which freed peoples and led to the independence of new States, which then joined the ranks of the Members of the ILO. The ideal of promoting social justice in the world as the basis for universal and lasting peace was thus strengthened.

The 75 years of experience of the ILO and the 50 years since the Declaration of Philadelphia have discredited the ideas underlying the old dictatorships and set back or eliminated the policies of separation and exclusion.

The ILO has chosen this double anniversary to carry out a general analysis of its objectives and its means of action. Its ability to rethink its role is a sign of our Organization's vitality.

This is why my delegation is happy to see the Democratic Republic of South Africa returning to the great family of the ILO after more than 30 years of exclusion which were brought about by the scourge of apartheid that afflicted this great people. On behalf of my country, it is a pleasure for me to welcome the presence of their tripartite delegation at this great temple of human fraternity, freedom, justice and equality.

Even as we express our happiness as we recognize and reunite with our brothers from South Africa, we must express deep regret at what is happening in Rwanda, which is becoming involved in a hellish cycle of genocide. We would also like to encourage the process which is taking place in Burundi in quest of a peaceful solution to the tragedy which has thrown this sister country into mourning.

Faced with these events, the Governing Body of the ILO has decided decisively to turn to the future, and we must reflect on the responsibilities which we need to assume in the days to come.

Our institutions have now undergone profound changes. We see an abrupt acceleration of the process of globalization of the world market economy. This situation was made worse for the countries of the CFA franc zone on 12 January 1994.

The working world has been profoundly transformed. Its social dimension has been torn apart. In their programmes for the future some institutions have given full priority to economic development at the expense of social development. Poverty is spreading and destitution is taking hold for some, while wealth and fortune are accumulating for others. The gap is widening between both people and countries. Selfishness is winning the day and injustice is on the rise. International solidarity is waning, sapping human brotherhood.

Faced with this new political, economic and social situation, what strategy should we adopt? What changes should we make to international cooperation? Are we ready to have North-South relations based on solidarity and justice?

It is in search of solutions to these momentous questions that we must try to work in order to face the challenges of the years to come.

The period of transition which our Organization is experiencing coincides with another, which the Central African Republic is undergoing. Our country, after more than 30 years of dictatorship, has now begun an era of changes that have been dearly paid for. I am referring to the establishment of a free, pluralistic and participatory democracy which resulted from the uncontested elections of September 1993.

These changes are a source of hope for the valiant working people of the Central African Republic. However, the changes have been severely tested by the devaluation of the CFA franc. The devaluation was a brutal decision with extremely adverse consequences. It had the effect of a bomb shell on the people's confidence coming as it did after a traumatic past which left behind a cumbersome legacy of debt.

Faced with the speeded globalization of the market economy and the devaluation of the CFA franc with all the difficulties it entails, the Central African people have not given in to discouragement. They have shown great maturity and a high sense of responsibility and solidarity thanks to the understanding of employers and workers and of their respective organizations who have participated in active partnership with the Government to avoid catastrophe.

Instead of dwelling on the past, we have decided to take courage and do everything we can to build anew on the ruins of the past, although this means working in a context lacking rules, and in one which is frequently hostile to our full development.

My delegation is convinced that the main instrument to cancel the negative consequences of the accelerated globalization of the world economy, and the devaluation ot the CFA franc, is concertation and dialogue. We support the proposals made by the Director-General for new orientations and principles for technical cooperation.

The Government of the Central African Republic concurs with the three themes highlighted by the Director-General in the presentation of his excellent Report. The 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO is indeed an opportunity for the international community to reiterate its support for social justice as one of the central values and its will to contribute to development; its confidence in an active and mobilizing form of tripartism; and its will to adapt the Organization and its secretariat to the tasks to come.

This is the commitment which our delegation undertakes and on the basis of which we follow the principle which says that development is a fundamental right of human beings, and there can be no peace without development.

My delegation hopes that this message will be heard, so that the new approaches and the new principles for the action of the ILO will make it possible to give it the means to help us meet the challenges of the future.

Original Spanish: Mr. BERNAL CAMERO (Workers' delegate, Cuba) – I would like to ask the President to accept my congratulations on his election.

In the introduction to the interesting Report by the Director-General, we are told that "the ILO does not just represent a field of competence, or a social goal. It stands above all, for an ideal, that of promoting social justice in the world".

In this sense, the ILO deserves respect and the active contribution of everyone to assist it in achieving success in such a noble mission.

A constant source of social injustice in the world is capitalism, currently rampant across the planet. Such a system has not been, nor ever will be, capable of promoting true social justice or accepting it in any part of the world, because that would imply its own disappearance.

Having said that, I would like to reiterate to the international community our belief in social justice as one of its fundamental values, and one in which we are actively engaged in trying to enhance.

I believe that tripartism is a valuable instrument in the labour world which contributes most to social justice and to social peace.

The ILO like the rest of the United Nations system requires in-depth restructuring which will make it possible to achieve equal participation for each and every one of its constituents, without excessive predominance by international bodies which in many cases have been created in the name of freedom, democracy and human rights as well as justice, but which have been manipulated by powerful interests which are alien to those same values.

In the first part of his Report, the Director-General talks to us about "a changing world", the "disappearance of the communist bloc", the "end of the bipolar world", and the "triumph of the market economy", and under the heading "A chance for democracy" he says to us: "We can only welcome this development, given the obvious convergence between the basic principles of democratic societies and the values espoused by the ILO". In my modest opinion, and with all due respect, I believe that this statement is indicative of a lack of in-depth analysis and realism, when looking at the facts which have brought the peoples and nations of the world under the virtually absolute domination of the most powerful nations, thus endangering the hard-won achievements by workers in our day.

I welcome the worthy intentions and determination expressed by the Director-General when he says, and I quote: "Our mission is to help [the new democracies] to grow into States genuinely governed by the rule of law, and able to guarantee basic human rights, and the rights of workers in particular. Our task in many countries – and particularly in the countries in transition to a market economy – is to facilitate the growth of free and independent employers' and workers' organizations, and prepare them to play an effective role in economic and social development". This appears to extend the functions of the ILO beyond their limits, and it might encourage unacceptable action by certain organizations which have repeatedly considered themselves to be in a position to determine which trade unions are independent and which are not. By saying this, I am not opposing technical cooperation which the ILO can and should give to all countries.

The Director-General says that the "globalization of the economy has speeded up immensely in the past few years". There is no doubt of that, but there is doubt when he adds that "It will have a long-lasting effect on the progress and well-being of all ILO member States." The Director-General himself has since given us information showing that this is not the case. We of course need to define more clearly, and in greater detail what exactly the "progress and well-being" of countries means, because we must be very careful not to associate global, economic growth with the progress and well-being of all nations.

Although support should be given to any initiative which would make it possible for the ILO to be recognized as a co-participant in negotiating processes in the world economy, as far as the social clause is concerned, we should bear in mind that we live in a uni-polar world with economic, financial and commercial dominance by a wide range of transnational corporations. We are running the risk of falling into a trap which will affect the legitimate interests of workers, nations and/or groups of nations.

The ILO should continue its efforts directed at development cooperation. The fight against the phenomenon of social marginalization, the elimination of poverty and unemployment, the rights of migrant workers, the eradication of the exploitation of children, the improvement of social security, working conditions and the working environment, concern for wage issues, freedom of association and non-discrimination in employment, as well as the eradication of forced labour, inter alia, are all important with respect to labour and international standards in the form of Conventions and Recommendations.

When the Director-General says that It would be dangerous indeed if the ILO were to appear to be serving the interests of certain countries or certain segments of society and ignoring the legitimate concerns of the others, I would say to him that this impression, although it is dangerous and although I have not looked into who might hold it, is virtually a certainty for me. I wish I were wrong, but I believe that the ILO is, irrespective of the goodwill which I am sure the Director-General has, closely linked to groups, governments and interests which do not always coincide with the legitimate interests in support of dignity, freedom, democracy and humane working conditions.

I believe that the Organization could be more efficient without essential changes which would make it different from what it has been up until now. The Organization prepares standards which member States can ratify or not, as they see fit. The Organization monitors compliance and makes observations, and I think that is more than sufficient so that the international community can participate in achieving common objectives. Increasing the scope of the Organization and giving it more powers for applying sanctions does not seem fair if we above all bear in mind the wide differences and inequalities between its member States. There is no doubt that in the future the basis for such changes might be solidly laid down and then the Organization will perhaps be able to undergo changes of this kind.

There are many things in the world which have not changed and which are not exactly contributing to bringing about justice, equality, respect and the trust which should exist between nations and peoples. This is a good time to refer to the unfair economic, commercial and financial blockade which the people and workers of Cuba are still subjected to. Although this has been condemned by the United Nations General Assembly and millions of workers throughout the world, the country which imposed it more than 30 years ago has once again ignored the opinion of the international community and not only continues to blockade Cuba but is interfering with the trade of other nations through extra-territorial laws which call for sanctions against other countries trading with my country.

In such conditions, when no international organization is able to deal with the fact that part of Cuba is still occupied by a military base of a foreign country against the clearly expressed will of the people, and when the list of hostilities against Cuba since the triumph of the revolution is much longer than that of all the international conventions of any type signed in the world – and nobody appears to be able to prevent it – one can understand why we justifiably mistrust the effectiveness of international instruments while having doubts as to the changes which might be introduced to them.

I would like to express my greetings from this rostrum, particularly to South Africa's workers and to their leader, President Nelson Mandela.

Original Russian: Mr. GOMBOJAV (Minister for Population Policy and Labour, Mongolia) – May I join with preceding speakers, on behalf of the Government delegation of Mongolia, and congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents very warmly on their unanimous election to their posts at this session of the Conference, and express our conviction that, under their skilful leadership, the Conference will be a success.

Taking advantage of this opportunity, I would also like to congratulate the new Members of this Organization.

The 81st Session of the International Labour Conference is of particular importance. It coincides with a very important period, the 75th anniversary of the establishment of the Organization and the 50th anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration of Philadelphia. It is a great honour for me and a great pleasure to transmit to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and to all the participants at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, on behalf of the Government of Mongolia, my most heartfelt congratulations and good wishes in connection with these momentous events.

The Government of Mongolia fully supports the activities of the International Labour Organization. It is one of the most important and authoritative specialized organizations of the United Nations system based on the fundamental principle of universal and lasting peace born of cooperation and social justice, and tries to improve labour and social justice for the workers of the world.

The important role of the ILO in creating and supporting economic stability in the international community and its contribution to the preparation and adoption of international labour standards covering almost all aspects of labour activity and protection of the interests of the workers are valued highly by my Government.

The Report of the Director-General to the Conference, Defending values, promoting change, is highly topical and deserves our full support and approval. This Report mentions very important aspects of the present economic and social situation in a changing world, assesses the work of the ILO with regard to new decisions and actions and considers its future responsibilities.

An exhaustive discussion of this Report should make it possible to find new approaches to the future thrust and activity of the ILO. The Report rightly points out that labour problems are a cause for concern in many countries of the world, including Mongolia. During the transition to the market economy, as capital investments made under the planned economy dry up, and it becomes impossible to create new jobs, the volume of production falls due to a lack of raw materials and financial resources, and unemployment rises. At the beginning of 1994, unemployment stood at 8.5 per cent. Most of those without jobs are women and young people. The Government is adopting a series of measures intended to increase the employment opportunities. A great deal of attention is being given to the development of small and medium-sized enterprises, self-employment and on-the-job training. An employment fund has been set up, financed out of the State budget, offering credit on favourable terms to the unemployed, and mothers with large families to give them a head start with regard to employment. There are plans to draw up and implement a national employment programme.

However, given the priority accorded to the problem of employment, I would like to support the proposal made by the Director-General that a standing item on world employment and living conditions be included on the agenda of all session of the Conference.

As regards the standard-setting activities of the ILO, we support the idea that international standards must be adapted to the reality and needs of member States and open up new horizons in respect of promoting the basic and social rights of workers. We therefore support the Director-General's view that "the ILO's normative work is an ongoing process, fuelled by its primary role of responding to a constantly changing environment and realities".

The technical assistance programme is another very important aspect of the ILO's work. We can but agree with the Director-General's view that "if the ILO's standard-setting activity gave the ILO its initial prestige and established the Organization on the international scene, its technical cooperation activities enhanced that prestige". The new reforms introduced by the ILO are helping to raise the effectiveness of technical assistance. The multidisciplinary teams have already demonstrated how quickly they can respond to help member States. A group of technical experts from a multidisciplinary team from the ILO Regional Office for Asia and the Pacific was sent to Mongolia early this year at the request of my Government in order to study provisions relating to employment, labour statistics, vocational training and the development of small and medium-sized enterprises, so that they can be included in a national programme to eradicate poverty.

We are pleased to be able to point out that in recent years technical cooperation between my country and the ILO has increased significantly and taken on new form and content. On behalf of my Government, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the ILO and its Regional Office for Asia and the Pacific for their assistance and support at this difficult time.

It is a very great pleasure for me to state that at the national level Mongolia has been carrying out a range of measures to coincide with the ILO's anniversary. We hope to be able to ratify a number of ILO Conventions.

In conclusion, I would like to express to the ILO our hopes for the future of its laudable and responsible tasks, and wish all participants in this session of the Conference every success.

Original French: Mr. ATSAIN (Minister of Employment and Public Service, Côte d'Ivoire) – It is a great pleasure for me to be able to congratulate the President most warmly on behalf of my delegation and myself on his brilliant election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. His long and varied experience, first as Director for International Affairs of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, and also as a Worker's member of the ILO Governing Body, provide, in my delegation's opinion, the best possible guarantee for the success of our work.

The Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office reviews many burning issues which our world has been facing for over a decade. We support all instances of social development which preserve human dignity in all its forms, since we believe that man is the alpha and omega of all development.

No country can remain impervious to practices which debase human beings, and that is why my country, Côte d'Ivoire, lends its full support to the International Labour Organization in its quest for a world of justice, solidarity and equity, which gives utmost priority to respect for fundamental freedoms such as those enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in all the other Conventions which have been ratified in this connection.

My country also lends its support to the ILO's current efforts in preparing the World Summit for Social Development which, like the Rio Summit and the Uruguay Round, will develop a new context of social relations with human beings as the focal point, rather than material matters; a new social context which will point the way towards social progress, and which will protect and ensure the fulfilment of our children who, after all, are our reason for forging ahead on all continents – America, Europe, Africa, Asia and Australasia.

During the two weeks of our deliberations, my delegation will be taking part in the work of all the Committees at this Conference and we will be adopting the important resolutions resulting from their work. We will be learning and sharing our experience in the field of employment policy.

The employment crisis caused by the current recession is far from over. Since the end of the 1980s unemployment has reached alarming proportions all over the world. Today there are tens of millions of unemployed persons in the OECD countries, in spite of efforts being made to promote employment.

The situation is particularly worrying in the developing countries of Sub-Saharan Africa. Since these countries essentially rely on their income from the sale of raw materials, the drop in prices of their export products, compounded by heavy foreign debt, has pushed up unemployment levels to alarming proportions in most of these countries.

In Côte d'Ivoire the very high level of population growth, as well as the increasing rate of immigration on the one hand, the rapid changes occurring on the labour market which our education system cannot keep pace with, and the structural adjustments which have now been implemented for several years: on the other, have reduced the ability of our economy to satisfy the demands of a growing working population which is becoming more and more demanding in terms of employment.

There is no doubt that structural adjustment programmes have had a major impact on the labour market in Côte d'Ivoire, on paid employment in the modern sector, the employment of women and young graduates, and on remuneration levels and training. Changes in these areas reflect at worst, a substantial decline and at best, stagnation. After taking a few sectoral measures the Government finally resolutely addressed the problem of unemployment and underemployment by framing a national employment programme in 1990.

In addition to specific job creation measures, this national plan has just been reviewed and adjusted to incorporate a set of new measures which will lead to the increased efficiency of systems for collecting information on statistics and training, to the enhancement of the institutional, legal and regulatory framework, and to the promotion of the private sector.

This new programme is currently under discussion with a view to developing a system of coordination and follow-up for the action taken under the terms of this employment plan. The effective implementation of a good system to coordinate employment policy and an efficient labour market information system, on the one hand, and improvement of the institutional and regulatory framework on the other, are the crucial elements in the implementation of this national employment plan.

Côte d'Ivoire sees itself as one of the countries in the CFA franc area which has the best chances of actually implementing its programme. The adjustment in the parity of the CFA franc places my country in a competitive position as a result of the cost of labour having been reduced by more than half and of substantial reductions to the other conventional factors of production.

My Government is particularly concerned about improving its institutional capacity and its management techniques and, above all, it is concerned with availing itself of the financial support which has been made available to us by the international community.

Devaluation, supported by this substantial financial aid extended to us by our partners to help reduce the weight of our domestic and foreign debt will help to create jobs. On behalf of our President, Henri Konan Bedié and of the Government of the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, I would like to thank the countries which are members of the Paris Club, some of which very early on in 1994 were good enough to grant us substantial debt rescheduling or reductions.

Côte d'Ivoire has great pleasure in reiterating its attachment to economic liberalism as a development model and also to political liberalism as a form of economic and social management. But my country does not want to introduce any form of liberalism which would hamper our industrialization and modernization efforts. We do not want a form of liberalism which, by encouraging the importation of foodstuffs which are nearly always subsidized, would compromise the development of our own agriculture.

On the contrary, Côte d'Ivoire is in favour of a liberalism which would raise or maintain the prices of our main export products at acceptable levels. A liberalism which would preserve or create employment and which would improve income levels and income distribution.

I would like to close, by expressing the hope that the work of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference will help us find some solutions to the problems of unemployment and poverty, particularly in developing countries, and I wish to reaffirm the total commitment of my country to international cooperation centred on peace, stability and social progress.

(Mr. MENDOZA takes the Chair)

Mr. HARRIS (representative, Education International) – I have had the privilege of speaking in the plenary session several times over recent years, and I am glad that these interventions, and those of my union colleagues, have been regarded as thoughtful and thought-provoking.

Education International certainly wants to make constructive contributions to ILO debates.

But today I am angry. The time has come for some plain speaking.

You should understand that the anger I express in this august chamber is not just my personal anger, although that is real enough.

My voice today expresses an anger that is felt among our 19 million members in 130 countries. It is an anger that is palpable, that we feel tangibly as we talk with our colleagues in country after country, as we sit with them in seminars, work with them in union offices, visit them in their schools and universities and technical colleges and pre-school centres, respond to their appeals for solidarity and join them in strike rallies.

What is the problem? The problem is this: everyone is paying lip-service to the importance of education. But the morale of teachers – around the world – has never been so low. Why is this? Well, I will tell you why. Teachers' morale has reached an all-time low because we are confronted daily with the enormous gap between the rhetoric from governments and employers about the importance of education for the future of our economies and the future of our societies, and the reality of cuts in education budgets, combined with deliberate policies to destabilize the profession by introducing so-called market techniques into public services.

And we know that this gap between rhetoric and reality extends well beyond the education sector. We have only to look at the resolution presented at this Conference by the ASEAN Government delegations. The rhetoric of economic growth and employment creation, of economic and social well-being, is presented to oppose measures which would tackle the harsh reality suffered by workers in those countries and in many others. What a parody to talk suavely of economic well-being while opposing a social clause.

We know that we are not alone in feeling and expressing this anger and in regarding the resolution just mentioned as tantamount to provocation. We know our fellow trade unionists in other sectors feel the same way. Many have already told you of the consequences of such a resolution for the workers they represent, and I refer particularly to the statement by Mr. Kearney (representative, International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation) on Wednesday

There is one issue on which our anger and that of the members of other unions reaches boiling point – and that is the issue of child labour. Every delegate at this Conference knows that phrases such as, and I quote from the resolution: "the different economic, cultural and social conditions of developing countries and their divergent needs" are coded justifications for continued inaction over the exploitation of young children, the degradation of young bodies and minds, and the deprivation of childrens' right to education.

It is disgusting that the modulated formulations of a resolution in any United Nations forum, let alone the International Labour Conference, should be employed in order to rebut a measure aimed at ending this indecency. It is unacceptable for the sophistry of United Nations diplomacy to be used in this way.

I speak for people working in education, from preschool through to university. What I am about to say now will be provocative, but the time has come to say it. The politicians and the departmental officials and diplomats who play these games have generally benefited from the best kind of education, often in the best universities in the world. These very same people use their sophisticated education to develop arguments for the continued denial of basic education opportunities for millions of poor youngsters. That is the reality which sickens me, which sickens many of my fellow teachers and workers in education and many fellow trade unionists.

Provocative this statement is intended to be, because my trade union colleagues and I want you to sit up and take notice, to register the enormity of this thing. But the statement is not intended to be "holier than thou". We are not trying to suggest that trade union officials are better than the politicians or the government officials, or the employer representatives. Quite simply, our trade union role requires us to sense what is happening, on the ground, across all the productive sectors of society. Something is happening out there, and it is profound, and you have got to understand that. The ILO has sensed that "something". It comes through in the Report Defending values, promoting change. The Report's ambiguity and uncertainty probably reflect that sense, that fact.

The ILO was born from the chaos of revolution and war. And it has become a cliché to say that the changes shaking the world today – economic, technological, cultural and political – are as profound as those of the Industrial Revolution which gave rise to the idea of an International Labour Organization in the first place. One hundred years after the Conferences of Berlin, Brussels and Paris the same argument of economic disadvantage, which is displayed in the ASEAN government resolution, is being used to worsen working conditions and to roll back the hard-won gains of the past. And the case for international agreement – not national protection – international agreement which today means social clauses in international trade is essentially the same as it was in the 1890s.

The ILO was born from the chaos of revolution and war and became a solid institution for the pursuit of peace through social justice. The Institution has stood the test of time. While defending the values from which it was founded, it will have to adapt to and indeed promote change.

But you have to understand what is happening out there. The anger that is real, that I am trying to convey to you may well sweep away institutions. The Director-General is right to say at the beginning of his Report, and I quote "the ILO does not just represent a field of competence of social goal. It stands above all for an ideal: that of promoting social justice in the world." But if that ideal is undermined – and the employers and some governments are doing just that – this institution could also be one that is swept away.

Now Education International will, together with our fellow trade unionists, continue to work with this institution. We will do our best to work even more effectively. We believe in the ideal of the International Labour Organization.

We will continue to cooperate with the Freedom of Association Committee and the Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation on Teachers, both of which are documenting objectively what I have attempted to convey today. We will work closely with the Secretariat to prepare the next Technical Committee Meeting on Teachers together with the government and employer representatives, and we hope the employers' organization will not try to sabotage the meeting as they attempted unsuccessfully to do last time. We insist on the importance of sectoral activities because they enable the ILO to respond to the rapid changes under way in society in a way which is concrete, specific and meaningful. This is especially true for services. We will cooperate with ILO technical assistance which is so important for our members in developing countries. We will certainly continue to work with ILO for equality for women and the elimination of child labour, and we will support ILO playing a stronger role – a much stronger role – in relation to the World Bank and the United Nations Social Summit. I would like to say particularly that we respect and appreciate the excellent work of the ILO staff with whom we have frequent contact.

But, in conclusion, all this excellent work, all the traditions of the past and the potential of the future – not to overlook the well-oiled machinery of this somewhat ritualistic gathering – all of this can be undermined by apparently sophisticated, but ultimately stupid tactics.

There are lessons to be learned from history. And one of the most important lessons is the need to recognize and to respond to the genuine and justified anger of the people. That is what I have tried to convey today.

Mr. ROY (Workers' delegate, Mauritius) – On behalf of the Mauritius Labour Congress (MLC) and on my own behalf, I wish to extend my sincere congratulations to the President upon his election as President of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am confident that his long experience in labour matters will enable him to discharge his responsibilities smoothly and that under his able leadership and guidance the proceedings of the Conference will be brought to a successful conclusion.

I should first of all like to congratulate the Director-General for his constant effort to keep the ILO involved in the struggle for the safeguard and promotion of human rights and labour standards in the world. We also appreciate the dedication of the ILO to promote development in the developing countries.

I shall now turn to the issue of part-time work which is on the agenda of the Conference. This issue has been discussed among the social partners in our country. The MLC approved the decision of the ILO to come forward with a Convention on part-time work. In our own country we are experiencing a shortage of labour and we believe that part-time work could partially resolve this problem. In spite of the fact that a high percentage of women are employed in the export-processing zone (EPZ) and manufacturing sectors, there is still a significant percentage of women who continue to stay at home. We believe that the Convention of the ILO and proper legislation in our own country will incite women to join the labour force.

The MLC also appreciates the ILO's decision to consider the issue of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. In my own country such agencies are gaining foothold in important sectors. The proposals continued in Report VI will surely serve as a basis for Government to lay down the necessary and basic legal framework within which employment agencies will have to operate.

As regards post-apartheid South Africa, the international community should extend all facilities to Mr. Nelson Mandela's Government to allow it to attain the goals already fixed. Every effort should be made to stimulate investment in South Africa, which is indispensable for the economic and social progress of the country; and there is no doubt that the ILO can be of help in this connection.

The MLC has on several occasions raised the issue of regional cooperation and we have cited countries such as Madagascar, Réunion, Comoros, Seychelles and Maldives. Post-apartheid South Africa can play a vital role today to give a more solid shape to this regional grouping and we will have to work together in this direction.

Coming to the local context in Mauritius, it is gratifying to note that the Government has already announced its intention to ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

We appreciate this initiative, but at the same time deplore its blunt refusal to ratify the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), in spite of the Director-General's observations made at the Eighth African Regional Conference held in Mauritius in January of this year, when he invited all member States to consider ratification of Conventions No. 87 and No. 144 – two fundamental instruments which are in no way contrary to the pursuit of development strategies.

The issue that preoccupies all workers at this moment in my country is the new Trade Union and Labour Relations Bill, which is being proposed for a second reading next month in the National Assembly. The trade union movement in my country has fought tooth and nail during the last 21 years to amend the Industrial Relations Act which has many repressive aspects.

The new bill being introduced by Government is even more repressive and undemocratic for trade unions. What is more paradoxical is that the Minister of Labour has made a statement to the effect that the ILO has approved this most repressive and undemocratic legislation.

There is an unprecedented consensus among unions in our country on this matter: we are all requesting the Government to withdraw the new legislation, which practically renders all strike action impossible.

As a national centre we had expected Government to discuss the report of the Law Review Committee instituted to work on amendments to the Industrial Relations Act. To our great surprise the Government has chosen to modify the report of the Committee unilaterally. At the same time, it is proposing a new bill to institute a National Pay and Productivity Council and, in so doing, the Pay Research Bureau and the National Remuneration Board – two bodies responsible for salary revisions in the public and private sectors – are being made redundant. Concurrently the Tripartite Committee for the determination of the annual salary compensation is also being declared redundant.

We strongly feel that our acquired rights are being withdrawn and it is clear that the new institutions being created will not have the same room for manoeuvre as the Pay Research Bureau and the National Remuneration Board.

It is clear that the Mauritian Government is espousing the wage restraint policy dictated by the IMF and the World Bank. Its liberalization and privatization policy is particularly painful to workers and advantageous to the employers and the private sector. Not only does it aim to maintain salary at low levels, but also results in the laying off of workers; this happened in the case of the Central Housing Authority (CHA), when 850 workers lost their employment last year.

Mauritius has undeniably made headway in the economic field: but it is not true to say that this success occurred exclusively under the structural adjustment programme. Workers' organizations struggled hard to maintain subsidies on rice and flour for many years. We opposed all attempts to lay off workers in para-statal bodies and, at the same time, categorically denounced the proposal to devalue our local currency. The trade union movement has contributed and supported alternative measures for the development of the country.

The importation of labour in the country is another source of great anxiety for us these days. This phenomenon not only decreases our bargaining it gives employers the opportunity to abuse workers' rights; indeed, employers have on many occasions been accused of ill-treating foreign workers. We welcome the fact that the Government has tried to intervene to check abuses and infringement of the law.

We appreciated the fact that the ILO sent an expert to Mauritius to advise the Government on the elaboration of comprehensive legislation to deal with all aspects of health and safety. The Government, for its part, has shown much concern on the issue and an Act has already been enacted.

As a social partner we have always shown our willingness to collaborate with the Government to sustain economic growth and development. But we believe that the social aspect of development is very important. Workers have to be treated as reliable partners in development and the process of development should in no way affect their rights.

We hope that our Government will be attentive to the aspiration of workers and bring about constructive changes to preserve the sound industrial climate in the country.

In concluding, I reaffirm the MLC's support for the objectives of the ILO. We believe that the ILO will continue its standard-setting activities which have contributed to the social and economic development of many member States. I also reiterate our support and solidarity to our brothers and sisters in South Africa and firmly believe that their Government, under the leadership of Mr. Nelson Mandela, will give new and real meaning to their lives and a flourishing society to future generations.

Mr. ZHARIKOV (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) – It is a pleasure for me to congratulate the President and his colleagues for conducting such important sessions of the Conference and also to congratulate him and all participants of the Conference on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO's foundation and 50th birthday of the Declaration of Philadelphia. This celebration provides an excellent opportunity for coming back to the values of our Organization and for looking at its ability to realize them today and in the future.

The document The ILO towards the 21st century, submitted to the Office in November 1993 by the Workers' group of the ILO Governing Body, is a contribution to the preparation of this session, and adequately highlights the irreplaceable role played by the ILO in promoting social justice and in improving the working and living conditions of the workers in all countries. And we associate ourselves with this assessment.

We also consider the Report of the Director-General to be a document of great significance, marking a turning-point for the ILO.

From all that we have observed, read and heard, it seems that we are all agreed that the world today is facing tremendous challenges. The World Federation of Trade Unions, preparing for its World Trade Union Congress, to be held in Damascus towards the end of this year, is also making its own analysis of the current situation, particularly in the social field and in the field of labour.

And what do we see around us? I do not need to repeat what has been said in the Director-General's Report and which we all know. Thirty years ago the list of the least developed countries comprised 25 names. Today, there are more than 50 and the list is by no means closed. One-fifth of the world's population is living in extreme poverty. Unemployment is growing rapidly, embracing about 30 per cent of the working population. All this does not apply only to the developing countries. In many developed countries, social exclusion is growing rapidly, and the public health and education sectors are in ruins. It will be no mistake to say that, owing to the current situation, the majority of the populations of Eastern Europe have started to think that they were much better off in the past than now. Everywhere, trade union rights and freedoms are sharply endangered. What are the reasons for is? Why have we not been successful in promoting social justice? Why do the working people find themselves in such dangerous and unstable situations?

The Report of the Director-General touches the political and economic sides of such a development. In our analysis, we see that the main reasons are to be found in the fact that the dominant powers have taken advantage of the really brutal changes which have occurred recently in the world to impose upon all countries a new world order, a unipolar world based upon their concept, and directed toward satisfying, first and foremost, the needs of "big business". In this order, schemes are aimed to achieve greater profits by imposing economic and political conditions and options which undermine the sovereignty, independence and security of nations against the will and aspirations of their workers and people.

This pressure is exerted at every level of decision-making, be it at the national level, within economic or regional structures, or even in international institutions. In the economic field it is being realized under neo-liberal policies and massive privatization. This system, which could have different names, is the basic source of exploitation and inequality – accumulation on the one side and exploitation and poverty on the other. For the workers, for the trade union movement, such aggressive policies mean undermining the social progress won by a century of hard struggle by generations of workers. For the ILO, it means an attempt to eliminate the results of 75 years of our work.

And the real question and the challenge are: will we be able to continue to successfully defend our values, or are we accepting the recent conditions of crisis the world has been brought to by these policies of international corporations? For the World Federation of Trade Unions, the answer is perfectly clear. We do not have to adapt to the crisis, but we must adapt to the new conditions, to go on the offensive, to fight back. For the trade union movement, we need to find new approaches, more cooperation. But dangers are being posed not only to trade unions, but to all constituent parts of the ILO, to the whole world.

The real change the world needs today, is a social change. And for the ILO to be or to continue to be a "social conscience" for the world and for the United Nations is to contribute to the promotion of such a change. For this, we expect the ILO to adhere to and defend its values and not to go about dismantling its, and our, achievements in which the scope and the universal character of its Conventions and Recommendations are most crucial.

The world has changed drastically, economics have changed. True, the world is becoming more and more interdependent, but the internationalization of the economy should not become a transnationalization where everything will be concentrated in the hands of a few transnational companies, or a few governments, or a few States. In this respect, we fully endorse and support the ILO's increasing role in policy-making asked for by the Director-General: first of all, in the preparations and follow-up of the World Social Summit to which the trade union organizations in all countries attach great importance. We expect the preparations for and deliberations of the Summit to create conditions for the active participation of trade unions first of all at the national level but also at regional and international levels. In this respect, we considered the statement by the Secretary-General of the United Nations – Mr. Boutros-Ghali – at this Conference to be very promising. We welcome the readiness of the ILO and of all its constituents to be more engaged in promoting a freer interplay of ideas, a willingness to examine problems without preconditions and exclusions from the House. This should become practice because we agree that intellectual sterility can lead only to irrelevance.

At the beginning of the last century, the abolition of slavery was unthinkable. It happened. This century brought us the abolition of colonialism. Today, we are welcoming among us a delegation of South Africa as a sign of the abolition of apartheid.

Sometimes, what today seems to be difficult, even impossible, as in the case of the achievement of social justice, the elimination of unemployment, poverty and exploitation, we believe will be achieved through devoted struggle. I can assure you that, in this struggle, you will find the active and responsible contribution of the World Federation of Trade Unions.

Mr. EJALU (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Uganda) – On behalf of the Ugandan delegation I wish to congratulate the President and the Officers of the Conference on their deserved election to preside over this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. The manner in which they have so far guided the deliberations is an assurance that they will lead us to successful and practical conclusions.

We are also pleased to be here to join other nations on this memorable occasion, which marks a very important landmark in the 75-year history of the International Labour Organization and 50 years of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The Director-General's Report, Defending values, promoting change, focuses on the very objectives and mandate of the ILO since its establishment.

Anniversaries are a time for reflection – a time for examining the past, assessing our achievements and looking tentatively into the future for new directions. Looking back, we cannot but marvel at how much the ILO has done of which it can be proud. In Africa, for example, we think of the various employment advisory missions carried out by the Jobs and Skills Programme for Africa (JASPA) which for the first time defined "the employment problem" of our continent in terms of low incomes and agricultural self-employment. Recently, we have been the beneficiaries of missions, seminars and research on problems of structural adjustment – which all African countries are undergoing. Some of this research has been published in very scholarly books under the World Employment Programme. I want to mention one such publication: Africa misunderstood or Whatever happened to the rural-urban gap? However, the World Bank in its policy research report entitled: Adjustment in Africa asserts that the road ahead for adjustment programmes in Africa involves: first, getting macroeconomic policies right; second, encouraging competition; and, third, using scarce institutional capacity wisely. Is that all the medicine?

The World Bank report also blames most of the failed adjustment measures on lack of good governance by Africa. It also urges Africa to put "exports first". However, the authors of the ILO's Africa misunderstood clearly apportion equal responsibility for the African crisis to external factors as well; for example, declining export prices and the burden of obligatory external debts. I thank the Director-General for promoting and supporting this kind of research.

Still looking back, let me say how honoured we were to welcome the Deputy Director-General, Mrs. Chinery-Hesse, in April as part of the ILO's 75th anniversary celebrations in Uganda. The Deputy Director-General made substantive inputs into our programme for the celebrations. She made a keynote address to the sub-regional seminar on the poverty alleviation through the promotion of employment in the informal sector in East Africa. In this respect, I would like to pay tribute to my colleagues who were co-sponsors and present at the seminar: the Ministers of Labour of Kenya and the United Republic of Tanzania. The climax of the celebrations was Mrs. Chinery-Hesse's address to a tripartite national rally.

Looking ahead, we note with satisfaction the new structures that have been created in the ILO in furtherance of the Director-General's "active partnership" policy. This will facilitate technical collaboration and speed up policy advice and practical support to member States.

Let me now turn to the present. First, let me say what a joy it is to see attending this august forum the tripartite delegation from the Republic of South Africa. We salute our illustrious African brother, Mr. Nelson Mandela, and recall Uganda's modest contribution to the ANC efforts during its protracted liberation struggle. President Yoweri Kaguta Museveni recently presided over a national ceremony where Ugandans said farewell to thousands of ANC and PAC students, taken in by Uganda when the then apartheid regime in South Africa demanded their removal from Angola as a condition for Namibia's independence.

We equally salute our other African brother, Mr. Frederik de Klerk, whose courage and vision in the ending of apartheid cannot be overstated. The entry of a democratic South Africa on the African scene cannot but be beneficial to the African continent.

Unfortunately, our continent is still in crisis. The argument over the advantages and disadvantages of devaluations and stabilization is long over, but now we expect to see some results. And these as yet have not been too encouraging for Africa as a whole. Speaking for Uganda, let me assure you that we have been steadfast in applying very stringent adjustment programmes. Yet, our economy is still dependent on agriculture and that means, in practical terms, a few cash crops such as cotton and coffee. Until very recently the prices of these commodities were falling rapidly; consequently we now need to export three times as much to buy back our basic agricultural tools as 20 years ago.

Hence, along with stabilization, we also expect to see measures in the international arena to stabilize our commodity prices. Apart from this, there is no hiding from the fact that stabilization is not painless. Over 150,000 public servants in Uganda will be retrenched over the next three years as part of these measures and our employment problem is bound to worsen. As we have often argued, we need to incorporate issues of "social dimensions of adjustment" right at the inception of adjustment programmes, rather than as an "add-on" once they begin to bite and hurt. I cannot urge strongly enough the need to include all the social partners in the design of equitable adjustment programmes.

In his Report, the Director-General refers to the globalization process – the integration of world economies through trade and technology transfers. I wish we could say this of Africa. As has been remarked often Africa is in fact being marginalized and its share of world income and world trade is falling. None of our countries has been able to join the movement of progressive industrialization. The ILO research literature shows that today, the share in economic activity of the United States and the former western Europe has declined, and that of Japan and the rest of the Asian region has grown. This is the scenario which has given rise again to the concept of globalization and introduced the social clause. For marginalized Africa, we must rely on and ensure that the ILO does not abandon its responsibility for social justice.

In Uganda, for example, liberalization is the reigning paradigm but let us not forget that long-term development will depend upon a foundation of industries. Hence in the quest for short-term stabilization I trust we are not sacrificing long-term development. The international community has a role to play in ensuring a smooth transition from the short-term to the long-term concerns. Questions of appropriate industrial policy for Africa will have to be addressed sooner rather than later. The organization and promotion of the informal sector as a major player in African economies must be given concerted support.

Finally, these have been difficult days for my country Uganda. But peace has now been restored in my country and most of the local distortions in the economy have been removed. We have taken a giant step towards democratization. All this bodes well for economic growth and development. We have no doubt that given the necessary external support we shall continue to fare even better in the future. I am sure we can count upon the ILO to continue to be our partner in progress.

Mr. FASSA (Workers' adviser, Israel) – Allow me to start by congratulating Mr. Gray on his unanimous election as President of this particularly important session of the International Labour Conference. In the name of the working people of Israel, the Histadrut, the General Federation of Workers in Israel, I would like to express my special pride and pleasure at the President's inspiring and effective conduct of the proceedings of the Conference, and associate this with the Vice-Presidents and other Officers of the Conference.

The occasion of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration of Philadelphia is an auspicious date and few of the special agencies of the United Nations can boast a similar anniversary. The ILO is a special organization from the point of view of its structure, as we all know. The representation of each country is made up of representatives not only of governments but also of workers and employers. This structure is quite appropriate to the most significant socio-economic organization in the international community.

It was, it is and must continue to be, a vital and constructive model in the permanent struggle to build a better, more humane, just and free society, in a changing world, full of dangers and problems, but also of opportunities and hope.

Because of the special character of this session, it would also be appropriate to recall the conditions and background which led to the founding of the Organization. Those were the days following the First World War when the nations which were involved began to reconstruct from the ruins. A large number of new States were formed after the fall of the three great pre-War empires: the Austrio-Hungarian Empire, the Ottoman Empire and Czarist Russia. Many wanted to build healthy economies and create new values of freedom and welfare.

On the other hand, a social revolution was taking place in Russia, sowing the seeds of communism all over Europe, and threatening to destroy the prevailing social systems.

The ILO was born in those circumstances. Its basic concept was: Let us create better labour relations and gradually improve the workers' situation, also in order to reduce the momentum of the revolutionary storm.

The social ideas which were at the root of the Soviet revolution were rapidly trampled under foot by the authoritarian regime which, following the Second World War, also dominated the peoples of Eastern and Central Europe.

Today, after the dramatic fall of this regime, it is with great interest, preoccupation and deep solidarity that we follow the struggle of the working people of Eastern and Central European countries who are trying to overcome the difficult period of transition from a totalitarian centralized society to a democratic society, with a human face.

Thus, the extreme conservatives of the world which the ILO strove to restrain suddenly feel as free of any threat of revolutionary wind as they were at the end of the First World War. They have forgotten nothing and they have learned nothing. Together with their so-called neo-liberal partners, they espouse radical free-market forces, free from all social restraints and concern for the welfare of the masses of their people. They are trying to fashion a new-old regime, which will place restrictions on the freedom of workers' organizations and trade union rights that will be detrimental to occupational safety and health standards and result in lower wages.

The destruction of the bipolar political structure resulted in a situation where the very same extreme conservative circles see themselves as free of the balancing power of the opposite pole. Many multinational companies, denying the workers' right to organize, are trying to establish the power of the strong. The globalization of the economy also increases the trend towards delocalization of labour by transferring it to countries with cheap labour forces. One of the strangest expressions in this respect is that representatives of several developing countries, in this very forum, raised a suggestion aimed at relieving them of some of their commitments towards the ILO, as if these interfered with their prospects of achieving higher levels of development and progress.

We in Israel, representatives of the organized workers, believe that especially now the principles established in the Preamble of the ILO Constitution are as valid as on the day they were adopted. For example, two months ago we signed a landmark agreement with Manpower, one of the two largest human resources companies operating in Israel, which ensures workers' rights to fair wages and pensions. Now we are negotiating a similar agreement with the other company. Thus, the ILO's raising of the problem of private employment agencies at this session comes exactly at the right time, and we are more than ready to share our experience in this new development.

A second example is that, two months ago, we also entered another sphere which had previously remained outside the territory of organized labour: it is the world of small garages employing between three and 15 workers. Prior to this date, these workers were not allowed to constitute workers' committees and the employers paid minimum wages with great reluctance, even though these were granted by law. The collective labour agreement for the entire branch recently signed with the employers' organizations is a significant achievement and source of pride to us.

Another important and essential subject discussed at this session is the topic of part-time work since this affects another aspect of the fluctuations taking place in the labour market. The reduction in the number of large factories which, because of their size, give workers the opportunity to organize themselves, constitutes a threat to the future of workers' organizations. Hi-tech developments allow part-time working as well as working at home, and women are particularly concerned. The danger is that small plants may avoid applying collective agreements and paying fair wages, thus harming the weakest and most sensitive workers: women. The situation is new, but concern for the workers' welfare must continue and lead us towards accepting the legal instruments discussed at this Conference.

I will not comment on the third subject under discussion: the topic of mines. To our deep regret there are no mines in Israel. Our only mine, the Timna Copper Mine, discovered in the days of King Solomon, is no longer active and is used only as a tourist attraction. I remain convinced, however, that the subject is most important for the workers, particularly the miners who are always the avant-garde in democratic struggles.

Let us hope that, when the ILO reaches 100 years of age, representatives of governments, workers and employers will come together here and look back on the achievements and the progress of social justice in a freer world in which human beings will be able to smile, free of fear, of wants and of the horrors of war.

Original Portuguese: Mr. DA COSTA NETO (Minister of Public Administration, Employment and Social Security, Angola) – First of all, on behalf of the Government of Angola, on behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, may I express my satisfaction at Mr Gray's election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the annual Conference, taking place at a time when we are commemorating the 75th anniversary of the foundation of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

In a world in transformation, full of challenges, uncertainties, failures and other problems, there is nevertheless, hope because we can look at what has been done and what is being done by the Organization. At the moment, we are thinking about its current role and about its future – all these are essential tasks for a future which will be more effective and where the action of the Organization will be more credible.

Social peace, stability, democracy and development have not only become absolute values for the life of each State, but are being affirmed as vital parts of the world structure in relations between States, regions and economic organizations from various parts of the world as well as of the democratic vocation of international organizations.

Nowadays, democracy should be a way of life for citizens, States and the international system as a whole.

As far as States are concerned, democracy cannot be separated from development. Democracy is an essential factor in development and it should be the driving force behind the consolidation and enrichment of that same democracy. The success of the "democracy-development" tandem depends to a great extent upon respect for human rights, the rules and criteria of a democratic environment, transparency and civic pride in the functioning of institutions, and upon balance and harmony in the production and distribution of national wealth, the internalizing of new social and ethical values, the expansion of local bodies and their action, and the legitimate exercise of authority in promoting democracy.

We are convinced that in this year of the 75th anniversary of the ILO these are the objectives and challenges which our Organization is committed to achieving and meeting in the specific areas of its action. We believe that it will continue to support and assist member States in meeting their needs.

The major subjects brought before this Conference are extremely timely and should be considered by the majority of the member States of our Organization.

In Angola, despite the brutal and inhumane war which has been going on since UNITA rejected the results of the democratic elections supported by the United Nations held in 1992, a structural programme is under way aimed at stabilizing the economy and promoting the development of the country after the war.

Of course, the situation is exacerbating the already difficult living conditions for the people of the country at a time when the Government is implementing its programme.

My Government is making major efforts in order to ensure that the social agenda is included in the programmes which it is implementing.

In this new legal framework, the Council of Ministers has recently approved a diploma for the social security, hygiene and occupational health system.

Legal and institutional measures are also being taken so as to activate and strengthen the role of employment agencies and centres while promoting employment generation and placing particular emphasis on local employment initiatives.

We are also aiming at consolidating, extending and decentralizing the social security system so as to broaden our network of vocational training schools in accordance with the needs of the employment market.

We also urgently need to work to provide access to vocational training for people who have been uprooted by the war and for demobilized soldiers.

In the area of economic and social policy being implemented in Angola, even during the time of war, my Government would be appreciative if the ILO could intensify its support to public and private organizations to allow them, as a result of their activity, to propose new jobs and to give greater emphasis to programmes which would contribute to enhancing the role of employment agencies and their operations in order to meet needs and market potential while continually increasing occupational training activities.

We are convinced that such actions will contribute fully to consolidating democracy in Angola as well as to the social and economic stability which the country so greatly needs.

The economic and social reality which Angola is undergoing at the moment is extremely critical despite the efforts being made to deal with it.

The exercise and practice of democracy, social stability and economic development are totally incompatible with war. In Angola, hundreds of children, young people, workers and elderly people are starving because of this vicious war.

In Angola, hope and the benefits of democracy have given way to despair following the first free and democratic elections and the ensuing civil strife.

On behalf of the Government of Angola I would, speaking to this assembly, like to make an urgent appeal for all member States of the ILO to assist the people of Angola so that they may work and so that our employers can manage their affairs and the country's children can study. You must help the society of Angola to build a better and dignified life for everyone under conditions of peace, stability and democracy.

I urge you to do all you possibly can so that UNITA will stop waging war in Angola. Please help Angola to live in peace, unity and democracy.

Original Spanish: Mr. NEGRON TEJADA (Workers' delegate, Dominican Republic) – I would like to start by congratulating Mr. Gray on his unanimous election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am sure that under his leadership, this session of the Conference will achieve fruitful results.

As a representative of the workers of the Dominican Republic at this Conference, I would like, in the most succinct manner possible, to give you a report on the situation of workers in my country. However, first of all, I should like to make a few pertinent comments on a matter that none of us present here today can ignore. The new liberal policy of unbridled capitalism which is being applied virtually throughout the world, and which has the definite support of a wide-ranging sector of employers and governments, is gathering strength, and it is becoming a threat to the existence of our movement and is, at the same time, trying to tie the hands of, or even sweep aside, the ILO.

Whilst the structural adjustment programmes implemented by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank can perhaps boast of having achieved success in their macroeconomic objectives, they cannot deny that they have intensified poverty and even destitution on the American continent.

In most Latin American and Caribbean countries the minimum wage which was supposed to guarantee the maintenance of maintaining an average family, i.e. of five people, is not even enough for one person to be able to live decently.

In 1993 the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC) came to the conclusion that half of the population of the continent, some 400 million inhabitants, were living on the poverty line, whilst a further 90 million were destitute.

It is this very economic policy which is introducing a series of proposals first of all limiting, and subsequently annihilating the trade union movement. I would like to give several examples of this being done in my own country.

Without paying much attention to the demands of the trade union movement concerning a 50 per cent increase in wages, the National Wage Committee, after almost a year's struggle, agreed to increase wages by about 15 per cent or 1,456 pesos per month, on a selective and exclusive basis. This was only for large enterprises, while for small ones the increase was the equivalent of about 10 dollars in local currency. There was a similar increase in export processing zones and tourism, and we hope the same will be true for those working in the sugar industry.

We are continuing in my country, like in almost all other countries in the area, to follow the erroneous policy of wages being dependent upon prices. The cost of supporting a family in the capital, Santo Domingo, is 7,397 pesos, that is about 564 dollars. The national level is 3,700 pesos, about half of what it is in Santo Domingo. However, wages cover no more than between 18 and 20 per cent of the real cost of maintaining a family.

Hence the increase in poverty and marginalization, despite the fact that the Government boasts of macroeconomic achievements, of which the population feels only the negative effects.

The trade union movement in my country has amongst its immediate plans, the intention to continue its struggle for an increase in the real value of wages, as a way of counteracting the effects of the adjustment policy which have so greatly harmed our population.

On the subject of social insurance I must point out that the revised social insurance law is still quietly resting in the archives of the President's office. He has refused, as a result of pressure from employers, to promulgate this new law, which would extend coverage of services to the family members of those assured. At the request of the three sectors involved – employers, workers and the Government – we hired a firm of economic and social consultants to prepare a bill which would change the functional and organic structures of the current Dominican Social Insurance Institute and set up the Dominican Social Security Institute, of a tripartite nature.

This new institution would compete with respect to quality of services to achieve preventive, therapeutic and rehabilitative coverage.

The proposal indicates that family members of those covered by such insurance in the private sector would be covered immediately, those in the public sector would be covered two years later and gradually workers in the informal sector, along with their families, would be covered as well, so that in five years 70 per cent of the Dominican population would be covered by these services.

This bill for the creation of a social security system is another of the priorities of the Dominican trade union movement.

With regard to the Labour Code, in June 1992, and with the assistance of technical specialists from the ILO, we finally managed to obtain a new Labour Code. One of its major achievements is to provide for freedom of association, which protects anyone involved in trade union activities at their workplace.

However, this has been the most vulnerable aspect of this legislation in public and private enterprises, and particularly in the industrial export processing zones, which, rather than workplaces, are more like turn-of-the-century enterprises in that workers there are denied their most elementary rights.

The organization of labour tribunals and the presence of trade union spokesmen may be considered as being a step in the right direction in a country like ours where the weakness of the institutions makes it possible for the Head of State or the social sector having economic power to do whatever they like with laws, under the protection of a legal system that is becoming increasingly weak and corrupt as a result of influence and money.

So the current Labour Code is floundering around in this morass, and whilst it does constitute a difference vis-à-vis the past (it was born of an era of political dictatorship) its non-compliance reduces and lessens the conquest on paper.

The trade union movement has made, and continues to make, specific proposals on the political participation of workers in Dominican state institutions and is working to improve the democratic system, so as to plug these gaps which limit both political and economic participation for most people.

We support in-depth changes to the political and economic structures of the country, in an attempt to end the exclusive nature of the current system of democracy which is ever widening the gulf between the rich and the poor.

With regard to industrial export processing zones, the neoliberal concept which is being promoted throughout the continent attaches priority to the services as opposed to an economy which develops and strengthens the primary and secondary sectors, namely agriculture and industry.

If you look at the statistics of my country, and this is the case of most countries on the continent and, if I do not exaggerate, I believe of other regions in the world too, you will see that the role played by these two key sectors of the economy is being increasingly reduced whereas the services sector, which includes both export processing and tourism, is the most active.

These are not only leading areas but they benefit most from government support in the form of incentives and tariff exemptions in a desperate search for hard currency, and in an attempt to bring an equilibrium to the balance of payments. Never mind that the really important sectors for the development of the country are collapsing.

The export processing zones are growing in inverse proportion to how the trade unions should grow that are currently forming, protected by national law.

Of more than 100 trade unions created in these export processing zones, only six have been allowed to operate. Of the others, the leaders, executives and rank-and-file members have been dismissed.

The trade union movement has denounced their action to the ILO and to other bodies such as the General System of Preferences so that they can be sanctioned for violating freedom of association and so that preferential schemes can be withdrawn.

The fact that the now World Trade Organization, the former GATT, rejected the social clause proposed by the ICFTU and sent this trade union request to the ILO was a disturbing one.

Mr. MILLETTE (Employers' delegate, Trinidad and Tobago) – The Republic of Trinidad and Tobago is a small twin-island State in the southern Caribbean Sea, given to agriculture, but mostly earning its living from petroleum, petrochemicals and natural gas. Its population of less than one and a half million is divided equally by gender with 65 per cent of all inhabitants being under the age of 35 years. The labour force is approaching 50 per cent of total population. Unemployment is of the order of 20 per cent and rising, especially among women. Most new jobs are being generated in the services, information and petrochemicals subsectors.

The Director-General's Report, entitled Defending values, promoting change. Social justice in a global economy speaks on issues vital to us. But when Trinidad and Tobago and the Caribbean look to the wider world for paths to pursue in the realization of these values there are no shining beacons to guide us. The panorama everywhere appears to be of: large-scale city crime; random urban violence; rural violence; ethnic and tribal strife; growth of Western avarice and greed; growing markets for illicit drug consumption; decline of the family; pecksniffian surprise over gender inequalities.

One bud of hope on this desolate heath is the triumph of democracy over institutionalized racialism in the Republic of South Africa and all that that signifies, a triumph of the human spirit over most overwhelming odds, destined to blossom, to flourish and luxuriate. We salute the re-entry of South Africa to this family of nations.

There is a warming sentiment that modern Trinidad and Tobago must further cultivate its heritage, drawn from its indigenous peoples, the peoples of Africa, India, China, Europe and the more recent influxes from the United States, Canada, Japan, and Korea, in an espousal of the concepts set out in the Director-General's Report.

Trinidad and Tobago is committed to the forward march of ideas and action for social and economic development. To derive strength and purpose from the comfort of our heritage is only better to equip present and future generations to defend old values and adapt to change as the Director-General's Report indicates not to dwell in nostalgia for a bygone age. The competitive advantage of an industrial relations system is merely the crystallisation of the fountain of inspiration that is a country's cultural inheritance. It is trite to say that Trinidad and Tobago is able to be internationally competitive only by the skill and creativity of its people.

There are some aspects of the Director-General's Report which Trinidad and Tobago is uniquely equipped to facilitate, elaborate and develop, including the following: modes and methods of follow-up on the Conference debate; priorities and enterprise for job creation, productive employment, and the reduction of poverty; development and enhancement of the commonality of interests between management and workers within enterprise, eschewing confrontation as inefficient and less productive; enterprise innovation to buttress the desirable results of the market economy including enterprise productivity; enhancement of the role of the ILO Governing Body; elaboration of the "active partnership" policy for labour matters; assessment of the certain negative impact, and the positive benefits if any, temporary or medium-term of a "social clause" in the industrial relations affairs of small, developing, island-economies in the increasingly global state of world affairs; the adding of impetus and new vistas to sectoral activities, for example, in tourism, shipping, financial services, and telecommunications; production by the Conference of more readily ratifiable standards and Conventions; elaboration of future roles for small enterprise and the informal sector, respectively, in economic development; delineation of options for technical cooperation with respect to human resources development, training and employment; and the elaboration of roles for multi-disciplinary teams in relation to national employers' federations.

Trinidad and Tobago is equally sanguine in relation to certain matters strategically muted in the Director-General's Report. Primary amongst these is the pressing need to reconcile differing approaches to maritime labour matters respectively by the International Maritime Organisation (IMO) and the ILO. The maritime industries will play a decisive role in Caribbean affairs for some time ahead.

In exercises of this kind, Trinidad and Tobago would utilise the available resources of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), the substance of whose statement on 8 June 1994, we endorse.

For Trinidad and Tobago, the ILO represents the best opportunity to ensure that employers continue to apply universal precepts and values which spawn and promote equity, social justice, economic growth, technological advance, enterprise profitability, the elimination of poverty, fulsome human happiness amid social change, and environmental conservation.

We are a developing nation, culturally a Rainbow State, incorporating the diversity of the East and the distinction of the West. We emphasize our identity with the wider Caribbean. Our distinguishing characteristic is our regard for democratic traditions and respect for the rights of the individual.

Measured in terms of GDP, Trinidad and Tobago falls within the lower third of Members of the ILO. This group has a heightened obligation to ensure equal access to a fair share of the benefits of membership and to eliminate any tendencies towards inequality of opportunity. We believe in tripartism and we have espoused the ILO call for "credible tripartism". The direct involvement of players other than the social partners in the official process will not advance that cause within Trinidad and Tobago, and may, indeed, prove a setback to what has already been achieved and is now being galvanized for action.

Small member States, such as Trinidad and Tobago, have traditionally suffered from having their initiatives thwarted by the forces of disinterest or by unbridled apathy flowing from larger all-encompassing agendas. Globalization of the economy is increasing that danger, uneven records of implementation notwithstanding. We will continue to consider the goals and objectives outlined and the options set out in the Report, aware that the Director-General has invited us to do so. We pledge to employ our best efforts and our full capability in the furtherance of the best of the employers' interests and the advancement of people everywhere. This is why we are a part of the ILO, why we cherish that membership, and why we enthusiastically continue to support the work of this noble body.

Original French: Mr. LAUPRÊTRE (representative of the International Christian Union of Business Executives) – UNIAPAC, the International Christian Union of Business Executives, which I am privileged to represent here today, would like to extend to the International Labour Organization its warmest greetings on the occasion of this 75th anniversary, and also congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents upon their election.

UNIAPAC was set up in 1931 and brings together tens of thousands of business executives in more than 30 countries in Europe, Latin America, Asia and Africa, who in turn have under them millions of other staff members. We are represented in both industrialized and developing countries and, today, also in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe which are in the full swing of reform. UNIAPAC helps its members to combine Christian faith, entrepreneurial drive and economic necessities. This implies that business executives be both generators of wealth, promoters of social and human development and also answerable to society and for the common good.

Ever since its inception, the ILO has striven to maintain and develop a tripartite structure which is unique in the world and which recognizes the importance of workers' and employers' organizations. This tripartism is also a substantive demonstration of cooperation between governments and non-governmental groups, employers' organizations and trade unions which share with governments the responsibility for economic and social policies. An all-powerful State will ultimately bring about its own downfall. Recent history has confirmed this. But the absence of policies in the social and economic field is just as dangerous. Therefore, cooperation between governments and employers' and workers' organizations is vital, although in many countries that is still not the case. Subsidiarity – a term drawn from Christian social teaching – is today widely used to describe this indispensable cooperation and interaction between all social partners, their representative organizations and public authorities for drawing up and implementing a responsible socio-economic policy. Under the principle of subsidiarity, responsibility should wherever possible be entrusted to the lowest possible level and only when necessary should responsibility be assumed at the highest level of society.

The ILO has to assist in promoting the implementation of authentic social market economies. The market and competition are still the key elements in the economic systems to be set up all around the world, whilst respecting the cultural particularity and peculiarity of each country. Economic issues and social issues, economic performance and solidarity all go together, provided the social dimensions are in balance with the economy. We cannot have a situation whereby the social dimension is such that it will kill initiative and destroy economic responsibility, because that would compromise all social development.

In this context, UNIAPAC would like to highlight the crucial role of the undertaking and especially small and medium-sized enterprises, and the need to reinforce entrepreneurial spirit wherever possible. This is a priority or should be a priority for the ILO; as a unit of human activity, as a creator of wealth, and also as a citizen in any national society and in the world, the enterprise is a truly privileged environment for economic and social development.

Employment is the top priority for Christian business executives, and all protagonists in our societies must undertake to stimulate the conditions and framework to create genuine jobs. The dignity of people and of our communities is at stake. Greater flexibility in the labour market, work reorganization, greater commitment to basic and continuing training within the enterprise and by the enterprise, greater flexibility in wage costs, better use of unemployment funds – these are some of the avenues which UNIAPAC believes we must explore and embark upon with as much creativeness as possible. In doing so, we must be bold enough to tackle certain social taboos. And UNIAPAC would like to see tripartite discussions take up these challenges.

The ILO, which is responsible for promoting better conditions of work throughout the world, should in this day and age be helping to develop – whilst paying due regard to economic constraints – and implement structural readjustment programmes which, though painful, are none the less in both developing and industrialized countries.

However, it seems that the ILO has reached the limits of its standard-setting potential since, for some years now, the pace of Convention ratification is stagnant. The ILO is aware of this as can be seen clearly from a reading of the Report Defending values, promoting change. Paradoxical though this may appear, economic restructuring in Central and Eastern Europe, rather than standardizing national situations, is in fact encouraging greater diversity. Therefore, more than ever before, the ILO must follow the principle of subsidiarity and confine itself to framing general minimum standards. Certain ILO Conventions and Recommendations are far too detailed.

An incontestable part of the ILO's vocation must also be to translate human rights into practice in the world of work and prevent and combat all forms of abuse and exploitation. Yet no structure, no law can ever replace the essential need for human solidarity and responsibility. Similarly, no law can ever create better conditions of work in a generalized context of economic depression. To improve working conditions, and the functioning of our societies, we must pay constant heed to both legal structures, standards, behavioural patterns, and the economy.

UNIAPAC has followed the work and activities of the ILO with the greatest attention and has taken part with interest in the great debates on setting up and promoting a sound economic and social development model in a globalizing economy. The ILO's task must fit into this general framework and make due allowance for economic constraints and the need for solidarity. It is in this spirit that UNIAPAC has taken up the appeal sent out by the ILO on its 75th anniversary to reflect on the Organization's future role and the way to fulfil it.

Original Arabic: Mr. SAHBANI (Workers' delegate, Tunisia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should first like to say on behalf of my organization, the Tunisian General Labour Union, that it is a great pleasure to participate in this session, which coincides with the 75th anniversary of the ILO. I should also like to express deep gratitude to the Government and Employers' groups for unanimously electing Mr. Charles Gray, a representative of the Workers' group, to the office of President of this historic session. I take this opportunity to greet him on behalf of the delegation of my organization and to wish him success. I am confident that his long experience will serve him well in conducting the proceedings of this session.

I should also like to thank Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, for his useful and thought-provoking Report which boldly reviews the major problems facing the Organization and the world of work following the end of the Cold War, in particular the disappearance of the polarization that cast its shadow over all international relations for four decades, and following the many economic changes that have affected the world of work and relations between the productive forces.

Our Organization has put three wars behind it in the 75 years since its foundation. It came into existence in the wake of the First World War, adopted the Declaration of Philadelphia towards the end of the Second World War and we are celebrating its 75th anniversary after the end of the Cold War that left its imprint on international relations for close on half a century. It is paradoxical that whenever we put a war behind us we find ourselves faced with a major test. Our Organization has stood firm in the face of many challenges and can be proud of having codified labour relations at the international level in spite of all the obstacles in its way. It can also be proud of the international consensus regarding its role and the determination of almost all the most go-ahead elements in the international community to put its objectives into practice, in particular the establishment of social justice in place of injustice, exploitation and forms of behaviour that must inevitably lead to war and strife.

The Director-General's Report contains new ideas concerning the ILO's role as we approach the third millennium. It forges a link between the values of the past, the principles on which our Organization was founded, in particular the close link between peace and social justice, and the values of the present, which stem from such changing circumstances as the globalization of the economy, the scaling down of the role of the State and the fact that some 37,000 multinationals share world economic power and seek unremittingly to undermine the achievements of the trade union movement and the rights that workers and trade unionists have succeeded in securing through a century of struggle and sacrifice. We are standing at a crossroads and we shall have to find a new working method for the Organization that guarantees its survival and effectiveness so that it can achieve the aims for which it was established. However, we have to admit with some bitterness that despite our many achievements we are still far from the goal of social justice. Twenty per cent of the world's population live in dire poverty and hundreds of thousands of individuals are deprived of a fundamental right – the right to work. In addition, over 200 million children are working under inhuman conditions, not to mention the millions of people who are the victims of forced labour. It is true that the end of the Cold War averted the danger of a world conflict but it did not eliminate poverty, which is a grave threat to peace in the world and stability in societies. This situation prompts us to reflect once again on the working methods of our Organization, which has to confront the circumstances described by the Director-General in his Report. These circumstances reflect no credit on the human race, which has accomplished a major scientific and technological revolution this century but has been unable to offer a decent life to each of its members.

The hopes raised by the end of the Cold War for the creation of conditions conducive to speedier social and economic development for all are waning day by day. The imbalance between North and South is becoming steadily worse and the debt crisis, which has exhausted the resources of many countries, has become a secondary matter in international affairs. Moreover, the structural adjustment policies that have harmed millions of workers, especially in Africa, have no social dimension and have not achieved the aims for which they were devised. Suffice it to say that many governments have abandoned the principle of a full employment policy, thereby exacerbating unemployment and hence social distress. The ILO has a key role to play in preventing social goals from being sacrificed on the altar of competitiveness and efficiency. Policies cannot be determined by market forces alone to the detriment of millions of individuals. We await with impatience the World Summit on Social Development in Copenhagen and hope that the ILO will succeed on that occasion in remedying the many extremist aspects of the world economic order. We also look forward to the role that may be played by those who believe that peace and stability cannot be achieved without social justice at the national and international levels. We are convinced that the prevailing circumstances impose new responsibilities on the ILO and place it in the forefront of international organizations working for peace in accordance with its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The workers of Tunisia whom I represent here have made considerable gains in the last six years. Through negotiation we have been able to secure guarantees concerning wage increases higher than the rate of inflation. We have succeeded in consolidating and improving social legislation and we have reached an agreement with the other parties to amend all collective agreements, which cover 46 branches of economic activity.

My country has undergone a quiet social revolution that has created a climate of security and stability among workers regarding their living conditions and their employment prospects. These successes could not have been scored without the spirit of understanding and cooperation displayed by President Ben Ali who from the very first day, 7 November 1987, supported the trade union movement and stood alongside the workers in the conviction that social justice is the best way of ensuring social stability and promoting economic development. The results achieved by my country demonstrate the success of this approach.

Original French: Mr. MADOUGOU (Minister of Public Service, Labour and Employment, Niger) – It is a great pleasure to be among you today to celebrate the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization.

First of all, I should like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to preside over this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that their long experience and their knowledge of the mechanisms and the machinery of the ILO will be a solid guarantee for the successful outcome of our work.

At this time of great uncertainty, the world of labour is awaiting with hope and impatience what we hope will be the new and appropriate energy which our Organization will inject into its activities. This is an indication of the high levels of expectation of the results of this Conference, which as I said coincides with the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization.

In commemorating this anniversary the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General have each submitted an important Report to the Conference. After having made a critical analysis of the economic and social situation in the world, these Reports propose outlines for the future of the Organization and its future work, and particularly the place which it ought to take on the world stage, for the consideration of the Conference.

However, I believe it is important that we should bear in mind the fundamental objectives of the ILO as they were adopted in 1919 and completed in 1944, namely the improvement of living and working conditions, the abolition of forced labour, the prohibition of any form of discrimination, the defence of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining, the struggle against unemployment and poverty and, lastly, the establishment of social justice, which is a sine qua non for just and lasting peace throughout the world.

It is only bearing these objectives in mind that we, using the wealth of experience accumulated in the past, can see the future of our Organization in the face of the rapid conflicts and in-depth changes taking place in the world at the moment.

The ILO has been able to achieve positive results in its attempt to achieve its objectives since its creation, particularly in the area of improving working conditions and promoting trade union freedoms, but it seems to be rather lost at the moment in the midst of the major upheavals occurring in the world.

The difficult socio-economic context which the President so rightly described in his opening statement is very unfortunately a day-to-day reality for most developing countries, including my own. It is, however, essential for our countries to return to the path of growth because without this we will not be able to establish and maintain lasting social peace.

In his Report entitled, Defending values, promoting change, the Director-General requests the present assembly to give its opinion, after an in-depth analysis of the economic and social situation in the world, on the future of the tripartite structure of the ILO and its action in this area, on its programmes of activity and, lastly, on the role and place of the Organization in the international system.

On the subject of tripartism, my Government is aware and convinced of the fact that there can be no effective and lasting economic and social development policy without the participation of the social partners. This is why, since it came to power, it has committed itself to involving occupational employers' and workers' organizations in all economic and social decision-making. However, we would like the ILO to increase its training activities for trade union organizations active in the various areas of economic and social development, so that they will better know their rights and their duties and so that they can more fully and effectively participate in nation building.

We cannot but welcome today that the active partnership policy initiated by this Organization has become a tangible reality in our countries. I would also like the multidisciplinary teams set up in application of this policy to become involved in training employers and workers and their organizations and making them more aware of the need to have a calm social climate – without which any social or economic development is impossible.

A second area of reflection covered by the Director-General concerns the ILO's programme of activities, particularly its standard-setting activities. In this connection we believe that the measures adopted by the Governing Body to improve procedures for the elaboration and adoption of Conventions and Recommendations, as well as follow-up measures and measures for the supervision of application, are a solution which the Conference should agree to by consensus.

We also support the Director-General's proposals to resort increasingly to "soft law" methods, which consist of elaborating and adopting more flexible Conventions; these would be more general in scope and would consequently attract a maximum number of ratifications and lead to more detailed Recommendations to guide States in the preparation of better adapted national standards.

In a changing world, the ILO should play a leading role in the United Nations system. How can we fight social injustice, unemployment and poverty in the world if the struggle to deal with these scourges is determined only by the decisions taken by economic and financial institutions without any contribution from the ILO, which is known for its seniority, its experience and, above all, the noble nature of its objectives? This is not the first time that the developing countries have urged the Director-General to be more often present and, above all, more active in major international meetings where the economic and social future of the world is decided upon. We welcome here the ILO's decision to participate in the preparation of the World Summit for Social Development.

We believe today that achieving the fundamental objectives of the ILO depends upon the level of cooperation which it will manage to establish with other international, economic and financial organizations.

In the interests of mankind as a whole the ILO, the IMF, the World Bank and the soon-to-be-born World Trade Organization should join their efforts so as to bring the world out of the unprecedented economic recession and social crisis that it is facing at the moment.

I could not conclude my statement without welcoming the presence among us of new member States and particularly the return of South Africa after 30 years of absence.

My delegation would like to express its warmest congratulations to the representatives of this country. We are happy to be able to mark with them this important event, the 75th anniversary of the ILO, particularly since the ILO's action against the apartheid policy in South Africa has been decisive in helping that country to be able to look forward to a democratic non-racial future.

Original French: Mr. WEGE-NZOMWITA (representative of the Organization of African Unity) – May I first present to the President, Mr. Gray, on behalf of the Organization of African Unity and in my own name, our most sincere congratulations on his election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to congratulate the other members of the Office who support him in this difficult task.

The International Labour Organization is celebrating its 75th anniversary this year, and it coincides with the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

On behalf of the OAU and all its member States I would like to congratulate it most warmly upon this double anniversary and pay a well-deserved tribute to this Organization for the enormous body of work it has undertaken throughout the world during its 75 years of existence. The OAU is grateful to the ILO for the highly admirable activities it has developed in Africa, in particular for the pioneering role which it has played so effectively in the struggle undertaken by the international community against apartheid and in favour of restoring a non-racial democratic government in South Africa, which respects human rights.

It is thanks to the activities of the ILO together with the efforts of the entire community of nations that we can today rejoice at the return of South Africa to the family of the ILO from which it was excluded in 1964 because of the abominable policies of apartheid practised in that country at the time. I am very happy to say that this great African country, which has cast off the scourge of apartheid in a peaceful and dignified manner, last month became the 53rd member State of the Organization of African Unity and that a delegation of the very highest level headed by His Excellency Nelson Mandela – the first democratically elected President of South Africa – is at this very moment taking part in the 30th Session of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the OAU which opened this morning at Tunis. We of the OAU are firmly convinced that the new democratic and multiracial South Africa will exercise a positive influence over political and economic development, not only in our subregion but in the whole of the African region.

It is against this backdrop that the OAU lends its full support to the ILO's action programme to provide aid and assistance to post- apartheid South Africa in its reconstruction work. It also would like to encourage all initiatives aimed at eradicating the effects of the system of apartheid, by reducing and gradually and methodically suppressing all the glaring inequalities which have built up over the decades owing to the systematic practice of apartheid in all fields of activity, in particular in agriculture, education, employment, housing, health and social welfare in general.

In the eyes of the Organization of African Unity, this happy outcome of a democratic process, which has swept away once and for all the hateful system of apartheid and cleared the way for a brilliant future for the people of South Africa, is a source of great pride, and gives us great cause for hope. Yet the immense joy we feel at this eminently political event and its vast historical impact is overshadowed by the tragedy of Rwanda where an unspeakable genocide has been perpetrated and unprecedented selective massacres have been carried out and are still being carried out by those who were intended to ensure the security of the people of Rwanda which is now the scene of carnage. The Organization of African Unity which has vehemently condemned this genocide – rightly described as a crime against humanity – has spared no effort in trying to stop this bloodshed and bring the political and military leaders of Rwanda and the Rwanda Patriotic Front to the negotiating table if they cannot comply with the agreements concluded in August of 1993 at Arusha in Tanzania.

The Director-General's Report, Defending values, promoting change, provides an excellent framework for discussion which I am quite sure will yield appropriate recommendations whose ultimate aim is of course to achieve social justice. I would like to congratulate the Director-General on the clarity of his Report and the relevance of his analyses and thank him most sincerely for having agreed to attend personally the meetings of the OAU which are currently taking place in Tunis and where he made an eloquent and greatly appreciated speech sharing his views and opinions with African leaders at the highest level.

As you know, the OAU attaches the greatest importance to raising the level of social well-being and promoting social justice. These aims are enshrined in the founding charter of the OAU, and all strategies adopted by the OAU have always been conceived with an eye towards continuous improvement of the living conditions of the people while doing everything which can help to contribute towards attaining social justice for all. Unfortunately, we have to note thât the socio-economic conditions in Africa today are far from meeting these aspirations. On the contrary, one of the features is a state of chronic unemployment and underemployment, as well as declining household income, all of which can only exaggerate the misery and poverty of the people. Structural adjustment measures and currency devaluations, including that of the CFA franc, have worsened this situation in most African countries, if not all of them. Smouldering wars and sources of tension here and there throughout Africa do not make things any easier.

Economic and financial resources which should be spent on implementing development plans and programmes are often wasted on senseless acts of destruction with all their devastating consequences on the life of the people. By way of example, if such is necessary, we have the burgeoning number of refugees and displaced persons who live in truly horrible conditions. Another example is the collapse of our economic, technical and social infrastructures which were already inadequate both in urban and in rural areas.

This is no doubt a situation of considerable concern; however, it is also encouraging to note that Africans, under the encouragement of their leaders, are making every possible effort to pull themselves out of this difficult situation. As for the Organization of African Unity, we are constantly heeding the needs of the populations and recommending measures to be taken both individually and collectively with a view to alleviating the suffering of the people and pursuing the lofty aim of social justice for all. At the political level, the OAU has developed a mechanism to prevent, manage and settle conflicts in Africa. This machinery became operational last year; its foremost objective is to foresee and prevent conflicts. It has already been used with some success in several African conflicts, the aim being to facilitate a settlement, keeping these conflicts from degenerating and becoming more widespread, and to consolidate peace wherever it has been restored. At the social and economic level the OAU, aware of the fact that inter-African integration is a means of helping us find solutions to many of the serious problems affecting the African continent, decided to establish an African Economic Community. The treaty establishing this community came into force in April this year after having been ratified by the required majority of two-thirds of OAU member States. One of the main priorities in implementing this treaty consists of promoting the free movement of persons, capital, goods and services, meaning everything which can contribute to bettering production and trade.

The conference of African ministers of labour held in April every year is also among our ongoing efforts to find group solutions based on an objective appraisal of the political, economic and social situation in Africa. The result is a Labour Commission which three years ago became a tripartite institution of the OAU. At its last session, which was held in Addis Ababa from 18-24 April 1994, this commission studied some of the points which are also on the ILO agenda of this ILO Conference. I will not take time to enumerate all of them, though I will point out that the Commission has adopted a common African stance concerning human and social development in Africa, as a contribution by Africa to the World Summit which will deal with social problems next year.

I would like to conclude in reiterating the OAU's wishes for a successful conclusion to this Conference.

(The Conference adjourned at 7 p.m.)

Report of the standing orders committee

1. The Standing Orders Committee, set up by the Conference at its first sitting on 7 June 1994, held a single sitting on 9 June 1994. It was composed of 51 members (34 Government members, 3 Employer members and 14 Worker members).

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman and Reporter: Mr. Jorge Rhenan Segura (Government member, Costa Rica);

Vice-Chairmen: Miss Cornélie Hak (Employer member, Netherlands); Mr. Khurshid Ahmed (Worker member, Pakistan).

3. The Committee had before it the Note concerning Standing Orders questions placed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office before the Conference at its 81st Session (Provisional Record No. 2) which proposed certain amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

4. At the invitation of the Chairman, the representative of the Secretary-General explained that the amendments being proposed involved changes that were consequential to broader reforms the Governing Body had made to streamline its work. One of these reforms concerned the time at which the Governing Body decided to fix the agenda of the Conference. Previously, this decision was taken in November, 18 months before the Conference at which the item was to be considered. This left a relatively short time for the various stages in the preparation of standards. Under the new schedule, the Governing Body will now determine the items to be placed on the Conference agenda in March, 26 months before the Conference at which the items are to be considered. This means that for a question governed by the double-discussion procedure, an additional eight months are available between the time the Governing Body sets the agenda of the Conference and the date on which the Conference is to begin consideration of the item. This additional period will be distributed as follows: the Office will have two more months to prepare the questionnaire, and governments will have three additional months to reply to the questionnaire. Finally, it will give the Office three more months to analyze those replies for use in drawing up the report to serve as the basis for the first discussion of a double-discussion item at the Conference. In the case of a question for single discussion by the Conference, there would be an additional six months, to be divided in a similar manner between the governments and the Office in the various stages of standard-setting preparatory work. The changes should represent a significant step in the efforts to improve the quality of the reports prepared by the Office prior to the initial discussion of an item at the Conference.

5. The Employer members expressed their full acceptance of the proposals contained in the document before the Committee.

6. The Worker members noted that the proposed amendments were non-controversial from their point of view, and that they also fully supported them.

7. In the absence of comment by the Government members, the Chairman noted unanimous support for the proposed amendments.

8. Having unanimously approved the following proposed amendments to article 38, paragraphs 1 and 3, and article 39, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, the Committee submits them to the Conference for adoption:[1]

Article 38

Preparatory stages of single-discussion procedure

1. When a question is governed by the single-discussion procedure, the International Labour Office shall communicate to the governments, so as to reach them not less than [12] 18 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which the question is to be discussed, a summary report upon the question containing a statement of the law and practice in the different countries and accompanied by a questionnaire drawn up with a view to the preparation of Conventions or Recommendations. This questionnaire shall request governments to consult the most representative organizations of employers and workers before finalizing their replies and to give reasons for their replies. Such replies should reach the Office as soon as possible and not less than [eight] 11 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which the question is to be discussed. In the case of federal countries and countries where it is necessary to translate questionnaires into the national language the period of [four] seven months allowed for the preparation of replies shall be extended to [five] eight months if the government concerned so requests.

3. These arrangements shall apply only in cases in which the question has been included in the agenda of the Conference not less than [18] 26 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which it is to be discussed. If the question has been included in the agenda less than [18] 26 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which it is to be discussed, a programme of reduced intervals shall be approved by the Governing Body; if the Officers of the Governing Body do not consider it practicable for the Governing Body to approve a detailed programme, it shall be in their discretion to agree on a programme of reduced intervals with the Director-General.

Article 39

Preparatory stages of double-discussion procedure

1. When a question is governed by the double-discussion procedure, the International Labour Office shall prepare as soon as possible a preliminary report setting out the law and practice in the different countries and any other useful information, together with a questionnaire. The report and the questionnaire requesting the governments to consult the most representative organizations of employers and workers before finalizing their replies and to give reasons for their replies shall be communicated by the Office to the governments so as to reach them not less than [12] 18 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which the question is to be discussed.

2. The replies should reach the Office as soon as possible and not less than [eight] 11 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which the question is to be discussed. In the case of federal countries and countries where it is necessary to translate questionnaires into the national language, the period of [four] seven months allowed for the preparation of replies shall be extended to [five] eight months if the government concerned so requests.

FIFTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the fifth report of the Selection Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 3D.

I would like to submit this report to you for adoption. If there are no objections, I shall consider that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

The PRESIDENT – I would like to call on the Clerk of the Conference for an announcement.

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards has asked me to call the attention of delegates to the invitations extended to certain governments mentioned in the Daily Bulletin to attend the Committee's meeting on Thursday, 16 June, at 3 p.m.

The countries are Afghanistan, Albania, Antigua and Barbuda, Bahamas, Barbados, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Central African Republic, Chad, Costa Rica, Djibouti, Dominica, El Salvador, France, Gabon, Ghana, Guinea Bissau, Equatorial Guinea, Haiti, Honduras, Jamaica, Kenya, Lebanon, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mozambique, Namibia, Nepal, Nigeria, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principle, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, United Republic of Tanzania, Trinidad and Tobago, and Zaire.

The PRESIDENT – We will now continue with the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Hungarian: Mr. KISS (Minister of Labour, Hungary) – First of all allow me to congratulate the President on the occasion of his election to chair the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am sure that the Conference will fulfil its mission.

On behalf of the Hungarian Government I would like to express my sincere appreciation for the efficient work and frequent initiatives put forward by the International Labour Organization over the recent period.

The Report Defending values, promoting change, with the questions that it raises and the statements that it makes, should indeed be regarded as both historic and extremely timely.

It is of historical importance since now, approaching the millennium, there are radical social, economic and political changes going on in the world around us. The several decades of ideological and military opposition dividing the world have come to an end, creating an opportunity for utilizing the world's scarce resources for the promotion of social development and welfare.

The timeliness of the Report derives from the fact that it points at the challenges that we are experiencing all over the world: inequality between nations, the declining tendency in employment and the spreading of poverty.

All the values that the ILO has fought for ever since its foundation need to be protected. Action is required to ensure social justice, satisfactory wages and working conditions, the protection of life, health and the dignity of the working people.

I would like to express my greatest appreciation for the approach of the International Labour Organization in so far as, apart from commemorating the 75th anniversary of its foundation and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, it has immediately turned to face new tasks and new challenges.

I am fully convinced that with its impressive stock of experience, its unswerving democracy deriving from its tripartite structure, and its worldwide network of relationships the ILO will play a key role in meeting the new challenges.

This new type of role became the keynote of the informal ministerial meeting, which demonstrated the commitment and the dedication of the International Labour Organization and its member States towards the promotion of economic growth and the increase of overall employment levels.

The Republic of Hungary highly values the efforts made by the ILO. Many decades of experience, expertise and a wide network of relationships have provided very efficient assistance to our country in humanizing the world of labour and bringing about social justice.

This year the mandate of the first democratically elected Government of Hungary has come to an end. It is definitely a sign of the strength and the stability of the newborn Hungarian democracy that the Government – unique in our region – has served its office to its full length. This has been a major contribution to a smooth social and economic transition in our country.

As a result of the parliamentary elections of May this year, the country now faces a change of government. However, our traditionally good relationship with the ILO, the already settled democratic institutions and our trust and belief in democracy provide a safeguard that forthcoming changes will not jeopardize our relationship with the ILO. The incoming government is likely to emphasize social dialogue, the protection of employees' interests, and all the values that the ILO also finds important. In its work it can confidently rely on all the achievements of the outgoing government.

When trying to assess the past period, it is only fair that, besides the welcome developments, we should also say a word about the huge burden we had to cope with in the course of the democratic changes towards a market economy, despite the generous support that we were given. The GDP declined and unemployment appeared.

Under these circumstances the Ministry of Labour faces immense responsibilities. The Hungarian Parliament created the required legal framework so that the labour market institution system could be established and start to operate.

We have very quickly built up the labour market institutions that serve these purposes, and structured them to meet European standards. Currently there are 20 labour centres and nearly 200 labour offices providing labour market-related services in the country, providing support for the unemployed and operating active employment measures. The reintegration of the unemployed into the labour market and meeting the workforce demands of the economy now in renewal are guaranteed by six regional retraining centres. By raising a significant amount of funds, we have redefined the technical and institutional requirements of retraining and have set up a retraining system in line with most recent demands.

By establishing and operating the various fora for the reconciliation of interests, which stimulates cooperation amongst the actors, the Government has always respected and promoted tripartism and aimed to implement it as fully as possible. We firmly believe that tripartism is an indispensable element of democracy and of a market economy.

We have created the institutional system, the statutory regulations and the funding to deal with the unemployment issue emerging simultaneously with the transition process. We have relied on international experience when conceiving our active employment policies and training programmes. As a result of these measures, the development process in the labour market has become easier to control and registered unemployment, after a period of stagnation, started to fall one-and-a-half years ago.

The prime reason for this reduction is that the number of workers dismissed is now also decreasing month by month, which is a sign of stabilizing workforce demand in the economy. Our present unemployment rate stands at 11.8 per cent and a further decline is expected.

My interpretation of these favourable changes is that the Government has consistently carried out its economic policy; it has eliminated the centrally planned economy, created the institutional system for a market economy, transformed property conditions, thereby ensuring many criteria for economic development and starting the country on the way to a market economy.

In spite of the achievements so far, the fight against unemployment, and especially the promotion of the re-employment of the long-term unemployed remain the most important challenges for the years ahead of us.

All of the favourable results would not have been possible without the generous support of the international community. Our relationship with the International Labour Organization is of outstanding significance among our international relations.

I would like to stress at this point the gratitude and the appreciation of our Government to the International Labour Organization for the wide variety of assistance with which it has greatly contributed to a smooth resolution of the labour-related problems of our transition process, and most of all for the assistance provided in the framework of a number of technical assistance projects.

Hungary has done its very best to apply and respect international labour standards and to implement the high ideals of the ILO. This most sincere intention on our side is clearly shown by the fact that in the last period we have ratified many ILO Conventions which had not been ratified earlier for political reasons. We regarded it as a recognition of our successful endeavours that the ILO has placed its Central and Eastern European multidisciplinary team in Budapest and that Hungary has been elected for deputy membership of the Governing Body of the ILO.

The results that we have achieved are a firm foundation for our joint future work, and may open a new chapter in the history of our cooperation.

I wish great success to the Conference in its future work.

Mr. JEFFREY (Government delegate, Guyana) – Let me firstly take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of this august body. Let me also state that listening to Minister Mboweni of South Africa last Thursday reinforced my belief in a general tendency towards progress in human affairs. I wish him and his Government a glorious future.

In its 75th year of existence, the ILO can proudly boast that few other international arrangements have had such a level of continuous and pervasive influence on the lives of the international citizenry. This should be – and I noted that, in the Director-General's Report, it is – a matter of some considerable satisfaction. I dare say that this pervasiveness is the major reason why the Director-General's attempt to adjoin the work of the Organization to the developed and developing elements and trends of the current global economy has been accomplished with little resort to disingenuous configurations. The world of work is at the heart of individual and social existence, and the ILO has been able to successfully carve its niche at the international level. Our tripartite delegation adds its congratulations, and pledges its continued support.

We feel that the Director-General has made a valiant effort to deal with many of the contemporary concerns of our States as they relate to economic development and social justice.

This is very much in keeping with the stated raison d'être of the Organization: the promotion of development, social justice and peace. However, there is a group of related issues which is pivotal to the development of our country and upon which we feel obliged to comment. But first allow me to provide a context.

This is the first attendance of Guyana at the Conference since the traumatic general elections of October 1992 which returned the country to the democratic fold after almost three decades of autocratic rule. We take this opportunity to thank those of you – individuals, social organizations and governments – who have helped the process of democratization, and look forward to your continued support as we proceed with the work of development.

The task ahead is by no means simple. Guyana has a per capita income variously placed at between US$360 and US$650. Anything from 45 per cent to 80 per cent of the population is said to live below the poverty line, and the social infrastructure is in almost total disrepair. From being one of the more developed countries in the Commonwealth Caribbean in the 1960s, Guyana is now classed among the poorest countries in the Western hemisphere.

In the last years of the 1980s, the previous regime embarked upon an International Monetary Fund/World Bank structural adjustment programme which has recently begun to deliver some impressive GDP growth – 6 per cent and 8 per cent in 1992 and 1993 respectively – be it from a rather low base. But, as is usual with these programmes, poverty and hardship have also grown impressively. In his Report, the Director-General stated somewhat confidently that these structural adjustment programmes are intended to allow us a better living in the developing global economy. We sincerely hope so.

From our vantage point then, we note that, although unemployment, poverty and shortages of investment have become endemic in the third world, and there have been many attempts to tackle these problems, there has never been anything like the present level of global concern! The growth and application of science to the marketplace and the fall of the Soviet empire have no doubt contributed to this heightened concern. However, we suspect that it is the contemporary impact of these developments upon the developed countries that is the motive force.

Concepts such as social dumping and social exclusion have been devised to explain this relatively new situation. Maybe we seek too much, but we do require that, as measures are contemplated to equalize the application of labour standards, account also be taken of the need to equalize access to investment capital and the issues of unemployment and poverty in the poor world be tackled.

To return to Guyana, payment of international debt and the cost of energy consumes all the country's export earnings. Guyana is said to have one of the highest levels of per capita debt in the world – US$2,700 – and must continue to borrow simply to survive. To me, it appears quite unreasonable to expect that a socio-economically weak, fledgling democracy can survive with this kind of burden. This is even more unfair when one considers that important sectors of the international community have contributed not insignificantly to the decline.

The 75th anniversary of the ILO occurs at a testing time for the global community. None the less, we have survived greater difficulties and will do so again. My delegation only hopes that, at the end of it all, we will have produced the kind of human international system of which we can all be proud.

* Original Spanish: Mr. ORDOÑEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Panama) – it is a great honour for me, as Minister of Labour and Social Welfare of the Republic of Panama, to address from the rostrum one of the most prestigious organizations of the United Nations family, and such a distinguished audience; it is also an honour to present on this occasion, on behalf of my Government and my delegation, our greetings and respect to the distinguished Director-General of the ILO, as well as to each of the distinguished delegates here present in the delegations of the countries represented at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

It is also a special pleasure to greet and congratulate Mr. Charles Gray, who has the privilege of presiding the deliberations of this important international Conference.

As a representative of a country which is proud of being a founding Member of the ILO, I welcome with interest and hope the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the Constitution of the ILO, an Organization which plays a primary role in promoting labour and work as a basis for social justice. We also welcome the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the adoption by the ILO of the Declaration of Philadelphia – a declaration which defines the objectives from which stem the basic principles of the ILO.

On such a memorable occasion, the theme of the Director-General's Report, Defending values, promoting change, seems most appropriate.

From a human standpoint, 75 years is a whole life; yet it is but a flashing moment in history – a time lapse which seems less than a minute if we consider that since the signing of the Versailles Peace Treaty in 1919 and now, there have been a whole series of situations and changes of all kinds in international life, quite unprecedented in the annals of world history.

The vertiginous, uncontrollable changes we have experienced over the last few decades in the economic, political, social, technological, scientific, cultural and religious areas, including also changes in our daily life, mean that we now find ourselves in a world which has exhausted its capacities, its scientific theories, its deep-rooted social traditions, its stable predictions and outdated technologies, and now we find ourselves at a time in world history when it is still impossible to define clearly the profile of the new actors and styles which will have to shape further the tremendous world changes which we are at present experiencing.

Confronted with these extraordinary upheavals, requiring political decisions which owe more to original ideas than a conventional approach, trends are emerging which change our perception of reality – such as the fact that dictatorships are succumbing to the advances of democracy. We are now witnessing a confrontation between consultations and dialogue between dictatorships and freedom between war and peace and routine stereotypical situations and dynamics inherent in society – especially in relation to the situation of workers and their families.

In this situation of change, the International Labour Organization cannot remain on the touchline or ignore the changes. That is why I welcome the decision by the Governing Body of the ILO "to turn deliberately towards the future" and, within this framework, "to make a new overall assessment of the ILO's aims and means of action", bearing in mind the combination of values which we wish to preserve – values which, amongst others, are linked to child labour, improving conditions of labour, the protection of life and health of workers, wages and social security, freedom of association, social dialogue and, quite obviously, the right to work, whose real value resides in the basic tenet that daily labour provides human beings with dignity. We fully agree with the postulate contained in the Declaration of Philadelphia which states that "labour is not a commodity".

Today, more than ever, these values must be present in the Organization's activities, so that they are able to help the vulnerable withstand economic policies which ignore the fundamental value of human beings.

On this point, Pope John Paul II could not be clearer in indicating in his encyclical Centesimos Annus that it is absolutely essential that we recognize the fact that there are hundreds of people who do not have a life of human dignity.

I agree with the position of the Director-General expressed in his Report. The ILO must be a "relevant organization", and we should "ponder the desirability" of renaming it the "International Organization for Employment and Labour", with all the responsibilities this implies.

Equally, in the light of the challenges posed by the process of modernization and economic globalization, the ILO standard-setting activity – both from the point of view of the ratification of Conventions as well as their application – should be an integral component of this concept of a "pertinent organization" referred to by the Director-General; we should also analyse in greater depth the present mechanisms of this important ILO activity.

This concept of a "relevant organization" to which I have referred acquires even greater significance when considering the ILO's role in the international scene. An organization which no longer makes its voice heard in the international, financial community really has lost its true role, because the profound changes and structural adjustments have brought in their wake the impoverishment of many sectors of the population who suffer from unemployment and underemployment; and the globalization of the economy has limited the capacity of governments to apply policies which will develop programmes aimed at encouraging social progress.

Given this scenario, I should like, from this august building of a United Nations agency, and as a Member of this Organization, to request the ILO to make greater efforts to fulfil the solemn obligation which it undertook on 10 May, 50 years ago, at the 26th Session of the Conference, when it adopted the Declaration of Philadelphia – more particularly the contents of Section II.

These brave words should not just remain part of our history. The decision-making bodies of the ILO must be given the possibility to take decisions which have an impact beyond the walls of this building and the restricted Ministries of Labour in our countries. Only then will the ILO be able to make its presence felt in this time of challenge and help build a better world.

In the report which Panama will present at the World Summit for Social Development, to be held in March of next year in Copenhagen, Denmark, we shall make specific reference to views that the ILO should participate fully in international mechanisms; and we are sure that this will be in line with the formulation and application of economic and social policies.

Finally, I do not wish to conclude this statement without mentioning first of all that in my country we have fully experienced this process of change; we are fully aware that we find ourselves in a changing world, where we need, most of all, imagination and discipline to transform the far-reaching challenges stemming from the new world economic order into opportunities for our national future.

That is why the administration and Government of the President of the Republic, Guillermo Endara Galimany, has worked to reconstruct and modernize the country within the context of democratic principles and principles of liberty which the people have decided to respect and defend.

We have witnessed the dramatic return by Panama to democracy within the context of the transitional Government, have achieved tremendous progress and made many advances. Bearing in mind the unparalleled difficulties facing this Government, we have achieved the following: positive results in the area of public finance; the notable growth of the economy over the last four years – one of the highest in the region; the overcoming of the critical legacy of our internal debt, thanks to assistance from and negotiations with the Paris Club, private banks and others, so that we can now forge ahead into new investments; major improvements as regards human rights; improvements in health and education infrastructures; improvements in the social security fund; training programmes; an unemployment rate of 12.5 per cent which, although still high, is low compared to that of 30 per cent before the new administration took over; a minimum wage which has been increased by 21 per cent – which, together with income-tax rebates for low wage earners, means that purchasing power for this wage category has increased by 25 per cent; a strengthening of democratic institutions – this has been borne out by the exemplary elections we had on 8 May when we emerged victorious.

The new Government will therefore take office on 1 November 1994 in an economic, social and political situation very different from that which existed four years ago; it will be able to confront the problems of our development with a capacity which will make its presence felt in the world.

Mr. ZIMBA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Zambia) – Allow me on behalf of the Zambian Government, the Zambian delegation to this Conference and indeed on my own behalf to place on record my warm congratulations to the President and of course his entire team on his election to office in respect of this august and historic 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. His unanimous election is a great honour both to himself and his country. I am confident that with his immense experience, he will no doubt steer the proceedings of this Conference to a successful conclusion.

Like previous speakers, let me welcome the new Members to the ILO, and salute in particular the readmission of South Africa. For Zambia, the readmission of the Republic of South Africa to this world body symbolizes the victory of justice and reason over the forces of social bigotry, and the freeing of labour relations in the southern African subcontinent. Zambia is proud to have contributed to that process of cooperation between the liberation movements and the African trade unions in South Africa on the one hand and the people and Government of the Republic of Zambia on the other.

By fate of geographical linkage to South Africa, Zambia's economic situation was brutally affected because of her desire to abide by the United Nations decision on sanctions against South Africa, which were seen as the only peaceful means to force the South African regime to abandon apartheid. Recognizing that basic human rights were at the centre of the struggle, Zambia had to die a little for the eradication of racism and apartheid. Having decided to host the African National Congress of South Africa, Zambia received hostile attitudes from the South African Government resulting in deaths and destruction of property in Zambia by the South African Government and its agents. Although we regret the deaths and destruction of property, the support given to the ANC is not regretted as we are now comforted that our suffering of these destructive activities was not in vain.

The international community also played an important role in the achievements made over the South African issue. These achievements are in the main a response to international pressure. It is therefore our view that the new South Africa will continue to be assisted to ensure its smooth integration into the wider community. For example, in the field of labour, the new South Africa will need the assistance of the ILO and its member States. Zambia stands ready to support the new South Africa in this respect.

Permit me now to compliment Mr. Hansenne the Director-General and his staff for all the reports before us including the report focusing on social justice in a global economy and giving details of past and future activities of the International Labour Organization and the Office. The reports provide us with valuable information on the nature, structure and values of the ILO and the challenges it faces for the promotion and supervision of basic social rights in the face of globalization of the economy and greater international competition. The large number of challenges facing the ILO is proof of the magnitude of the issues the ILO seeks to deal with and solve in its attempt to assist the constituent Members to serve their people well.

Like all speakers before me, let me express, on behalf of the Government and people of Zambia, our sincere and hearty congratulations to the ILO on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. An anniversary such as the one we are commemorating this year is an important occasion. It is important because it affords an opportunity to look back and undertake a historic sojourn. This in turn helps us to look ahead, reflect and plan for the future. The Director-General's Report has done justice to the history of the ideals of the ILO, and has presented the possible path that our Organization may take for the future in order to give the ILO activities a higher profile in the public eye. I and my delegation congratulate the Director-General for his thoughtful and thought-provoking Report to this Conference.

The International Labour Organization has undergone a bitter struggle since its inception in 1919. Despite formidable challenges and obstacles over the past 75 years, its achievements have been remarkable. It has asserted itself to be the sole organization at the centre of the effort for furthering the welfare of working people everywhere.

Whilst noting the tradition of the ILO's responsibility of examining and considering all the international social and economic policies and taking measures in the light of social justice, the socio-economic situation in the developing countries appears to have experienced little or stagnant development in the last two decades. I am aware that the prime task of the ILO since its inception has been that of improving conditions of life and work through, inter alia, the building of a code of law and practice. The ILO has performed this task with success and this has given the ILO much prominence. There is not a single country today which can claim that its legislation and/or practice have remained completely unaffected by standards formulated by the ILO. I am also aware, however, that the greatest importance of international labour standards lies to a large extent in their being readily accepted and, perhaps more significantly, implemented. In this way, they exert their effect on social and economic development in constituent Members. The question of implementation raises the issue of supervision. The ILO has established a supervisory machinery which, in terms of effectiveness and efficiency, is second to none. It behoves all member States of the ILO to strive to preserve and strengthen the supervisory machinery.

All standards that have been adopted here are meant to be implemented. However, in some cases, there are serious difficulties standing in the way of implementation. The inability readily to implement these instruments should be viewed against many factors, particularly as they relate to developing countries. These may be detailed as political instability, social and economic situations, technological and social infrastructures, to mention but a few. Civil strife and ethnic wars have brought in their wake serious political instability. This instability has shifted the focus of these countries from development programmes to ways to abate the turbulent situation. The aftermath of the ongoing civil strife and ethnic wars has been the growing destruction of social infrastructures, reduction in employment opportunities, social and economic stagnation, displacement of the population and, above all, severe and acute poverty.

The other factors relate to financial and economic management. The ongoing prescription of structural adjustment programmes unfortunately appears to largely address the financial imbalances in the economy but regrettably seems to accentuate social and economic injustices. These programmes have more often than not resulted in high social costs including retrenchments and loss of income for the most vulnerable groups, and has increased the proportion of poverty. The situation has been aggravated by institutional weaknesses and also natural disasters such as droughts. Overall, the capacities of developing countries to improve the social and economic situation of their people has been seriously impaired. All these factors have, one way or another, stood against the ratification, let alone implementation, of ILO standards.

In spite of the foregoing, the importance and relevance of ILO standards has not diminished. Zambia will continue to support efforts to streamline and consolidate ILO standards and the standard-setting process to ensure that they are as effective and as relevant as possible. At the same time, Zambia recognizes that, whilst standards should continue to be universal, a great deal of flexibility is still called for. This means that we shall continue to support the inclusion of flexibility clauses in the ILO standards in order to make allowances for different levels of development.

In his Report, the Director-General has touched on the sphere of competence of the ILO. As it is now, the area of competence – dealing as it does with social justice – is quite wide. This means that the Organization is fully loaded, and I tend to agree with the Director-General that we should not cultivate any other areas, particularly those areas where other organizations are already involved. Rather, we should channel all our efforts and resources into doing that which we have done better in the past. We should channel our energies and resources into consolidating and improving our achievements in the current vast, complex, varied and topical areas of our competence. This does not in any way suggest that we should refuse to cooperate with other agencies whose goals touch on our terms of reference in this age of interdependence.

With regard to the Director-General's proposal to change the name of the ILO to the "International Organization for Employment and Labour" let me say that Zambia believes that this is unnecessary. The term "labour" is so wide and should be understood to include employment as well as a whole host of other related issues. Furthermore, it is our feeling that successes in substantive areas, rather than name changes, are the best way to give the ILO activities a higher profile in the public eye.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL DERHEM (Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Housing, Qatar) – In the name of God the Merciful, the Compassionate! I am very pleased at the very beginning of my speech to be able to pass on to you the greetings of Sheikh Khalifa bin Hamad Al-Thani, the Emir of the State of Qatar, on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, and his hopes for the success of this session.

On behalf of the delegation of Qatar and myself I would like to congratulate the President on his election to this very important post.

I am also very pleased to be able to congratulate the Sultanate of Oman on joining this Organization, and the delegations of Turkmenistan and Tajikistan.

I would also like to welcome the delegation of South Africa which has come back to the fold of this Organization, and applaud the new era of freedom for our friends in South Africa.

I am no doubt very near to the truth when I say that the Report of the Director-General is a splendid effort to give shape to a pioneering strategic vision whose moral and human dimensions are essential at a time when unbridled materialism is overriding all our civilization has achieved and when disillusionment is legion. The Report of the Director-General seems to sum up the concerns felt by all the peoples of the world, including those afflicted by poverty, destitution and the difficulties of life in a world where some parties are privy to great wealth and well-being.

I am sure that the spirit of the Report, which analyses the world economic developments and testifies to a desire to eliminate all their negative consequences, is a source of optimism and confidence in this Organization as the active defender of human dignity.

This Report states that the globalization of the economy has serious consequences for the concept of the State, as political leaders no longer see the State as sharing responsibility for the destiny of the people. This is difficult for us to accept because it implies the emergence of new forms of conflict and discord at the international level, the disintegration of the bonds uniting a single people and the transformation of an individual into an isolated being stripped of his or her will and relationships. It is equally difficult for us to stand by and watch the role of the State being eroded and become alienated from its principal task, namely to protect the bonds of society and coordinate efforts to improve the quality and standard of living. We are convinced that by instinct individuals tend to form groups, work together, produce, innovate and above all assert his or herself. This instinct is our major asset, protecting us from being drawn into decadent materialism and helping us to find our way back to the right path.

It is therefore our duty, within the Organization, to try to avoid this scenario at all costs. Above all, we must see development as a spiritual and material improvement to people's lives and the historical development of humanity.

In this regard, we would like to say that, on the basis of our deepest convictions and in the light of practical experience, we see the State as having an essential role in protecting the bonds of society. Our national strategy and social policy, under the leadership of the Emir and the heir presumptive, aim to consolidate this role by protecting the family and the individual and guaranteeing all citizens conditions conducive to a life of dignity enjoyed in a climate of peace and stability. Particular priority is paid to education and training services to ensure that young people can find work in the various sectors of the economy and offer them the best opportunities for employment and labour protection, whilst at work and after.

The Director-General has raised an important question concerning the Organization's position towards the social clause in the light of present world economic developments. We are in a paradoxical situation in so far that people in developing countries still consider technical and scientific progress, the opening of international markets and economic development as a solution to their problems; indeed they believe that they will bring about progress and well-being. Will the situation be changed? Will these vulnerable people and communities be the victims of new situations? Will technical progress and capital become the blind instruments of profit to the detriment of the dignity and lives of millions of human beings?

New economic developments and their repercussions mean that we must now, more than ever in the past, hold on to the Organization's objectives, such as social justice and improvements in living and working conditions. The Organization's role must be strengthened not only to defend these objectives but also to consolidate them in all policies concerning economic developments and new international relations. There can be no doubt that the tripartite constitution of the Organization, which promotes dialogue at the world level, provides a unique opportunity for its constituents to clarify their views and positions and to play a role that might have a positive impact on later developments in the course of world history.

It goes without saying that, in so doing, this Organization will not play the role of a political organization which enters the fray and take the place of States in their economic and social policies; neither will it take the place of the United Nations as a higher world body entrusted with settling matters and being at the service of human principles and objectives. But it will try to become the cornerstone of social action which will inspire the world.

International labour standards may, as the Director-General stated, constitute one of the most important means of attaining this objective. Not only could they be applied by the member States; they could also be adhered to by financial and economic institutions who could also provide for a contribution to social costs.

Turning to technical cooperation, we agree with the Director-General when he says that we should increase the number and skills of multidisciplinary teams because technical cooperation is one of the major activities of the Organization – especially in developing countries. It is for this reason that we must find a system whereby financial and economic institutions may share in the expenditure of technical cooperation – either directly or under an umbrella organization grouping all the United Nations specialized agencies.

In concluding his Report, the Director-General has proposed a certain number of measures aimed at strengthening the Organization's role on the international scene in this rapidly changing world. While approving in principle these proposals, we believe that they need further examination. Suffice it to say that we should try to draw maximum benefit from the Director-General's Report so that we can put into practice his suggestions; and that we can try to establish ten-year and five-year plans for basic issues such as employment and the standard of living. It would therefore be appropriate to seek the opinion of the Organization's partners to try and reach the best possible solutions.

Before concluding my statement, I should like to thank the Director-General and the Governing Body for having provided technical and material assistance to our Palestinian brothers on the West Bank and in Gaza; indeed, they need all the help they can get from us to cope with their needs in the occupational, social and economic areas. We hope that the peace agreement between Palestine and Israel will bring about improvements in the overall living conditions of the Palestinian workers and peoples in these regions and that they will be helped on the path towards development, stability and progress.

I should also like to express the hope that peace will continue to prevail in the region and that an end will be put to the long suffering endured by its peoples after years of war and the destruction of its resources. I hope that these peoples will be able to have a share in the developments occurring at the international level and will be able to devote their energies to development and reconstruction in a new era of peace, security and stability.

I should like to reiterate my gratitude to the Director-General for having prepared such a meaningful Report.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-JARWAN (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I am particularly happy and honoured to be able to transmit to you the greetings of His Highness, Sheikh Zayed bin Sultan al Nahyan, President of the United Arab Emirates and his wishes for the success of this session of the Conference.

I am also very happy to be able to congratulate the President of this Conference on his election to this lofty post, to chair this important session of the International Labour Conference. We wish the President and Officers of the Conference every success in their work. We are convinced that they will be successful in carrying out their tasks.

It also gives me great pleasure to welcome on behalf of my country and myself, the Sultanate of Oman which has now officially become a Member of this Organization and which, for the first time, is taking an official part in the work of the International Labour Conference. The participation of the Sultanate of Oman is additional evidence of the international nature of this Organization. It also gives me great pleasure on behalf of the delegation of the United Arab Emirates to welcome the Government of South Africa, which has come back into the fold of this Organization, and I would like to take this opportunity to greet and congratulate the people of South Africa under the leadership of their President, Mr. Nelson Mandela. Their struggle has brought about independence and freedom, and we support the struggle of the people of South Africa against apartheid as we did in the past. We are certain that a tide of freedom is now going to sweep over this country, and we would like to congratulate the ILO for its efforts in the struggle against apartheid and in trying to help the people of South Africa create a democratic society. We are convinced that this Organization's efforts will always be on the side of those who are fighting against this type of problem in the world.

This International Labour Conference marks the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. In this connection, the Director-General has entitled his Report Defending values, promoting change. This Report enshrines the values which are the foundations of this Organization, and highlights the challenges facing us today.

We believe that this Report is objective and interesting, and this we applaud. However, we would like to make a few comments on the Report and share with you our vision of the future.

May we first be allowed to express our sincere congratulations to the Director-General and to the entire international labour community on the occasion of these two anniversaries.

We would also like to pay tribute to the very important role played by the founding fathers of this Organization, the intellectuals and the leaders of the world of work. They were the first pioneers to embark on the struggle to guarantee social justice.

This anniversary is taking place under very special and new circumstances, including first of all, the growth in the number of Members of the Organization, and a reappraisal of the Organization's fundamental principles. The Organization has earned the trust of its constituents. Furthermore, the Organization is called upon to take up constant challenges to guarantee international peace and security. The activities of the Organization have diversified in response to what is asked of it and needed. This clearly shows that the values, principles and objectives set forth in the Constitution of the ILO and in the Declaration of Philadelphia are still valid. Therefore, the main challenge facing this Organization is that of adapting itself to current changes and finding the most suitable ways and means of meeting its goals and implementing its programmes and projects despite the changes taking place.

This session of the Conference must heed the challenge laid down by the Director-General in his Report and at the beginning of the Conference. The Organization must play its role, in keeping with its rank and on the basis of tripartism.

We would like to look to the future with optimism. These two anniversaries should make it possible for us to look objectively at ourselves and our activities on the threshold of the twenty-first century.

We must first consolidate and strengthen the executive body of this Organization in order to improve its ability to implement programmes and be flexible when carrying out draft plans. This system would make it possible for the Office to become a centre for training, experimentation and sharing experience for all those involved in labour throughout the world.

Secondly we should extend the basis for participation in the representative and decision-making bodies of this Organization, including the Governing Body, because we must implement all the amendments and the changes to the Constitution that were adopted by the 1986 session of the Conference, namely to expand the Governing Body to 108 members.

Thirdly, we must also attempt to pay heed to all ILO studies and publications and ensure their translation into all the world's living languages, including Arabic.

Fourthly, technical cooperation programmes are a main pillar of the activity of this Organization, and we believe that we must draw up sound plans to develop these activities. We also believe that this Organization and other bodies dealing with the world economy should cooperate closely, but without linking international labour standards with international trade. There is no reason to use these standards as protection against exports from developing countries.

We believe that this Organization should take these steps. We say this because we can draw inspiration from the United Arab Emirates' domestic policy. We have broken new ground with our legislative and social measures. We have promulgated laws which guarantee the rights of the workers and, at the same time, protect the rights of employers. In our country, we must try to consolidate international cooperation in all spheres.

Original Spanish: Mr. AYALES ESNA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Costa Rica) – On behalf of the Government and the people of Costa Rica I wish to extend our warmest greetings to everyone gathered here and express the hope that the work of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference will prove fruitful. I would also like to congratulate the President of the Conference on his election.

I am honoured to represent my country and my Government here because Costa Rica throughout its history has not only maintained close ties and links with the ILO, but has always developed in the social sphere within the context of a respect for labour and social and labour rights which have cemented our social peace during our century-old democracy, and this is why we share the ideal expounded by the Director-General of the ILO to try to promote social justice in the world.

We consider his plan to undertake a global examination of the objectives and means of action of the ILO an urgent task in tackling the new world in which we live where the barriers of intolerance have fallen. We are conscious of the fact that only through dialogue and a search through consensus for new directions and greater solidarity among countries can we transform this planet into a world of dignity for all human beings, led by the ILO which will emerge strengthened in its new aims.

At this stage we have to analyse not only labour relations within the framework of a globalized economy but we should not forget that in the world of work there have been technical and technological changes and new management practices in enterprises, States and even the ILO itself. Nevertheless, the Government of Costa Rica believes that we should also take into consideration the fact that the object of development should be human well-being without prejudice to the environment. My Government which assumed power a few weeks ago has suggested that we should try to achieve the well-being of all the people of Costa Rica through fighting poverty, ensuring modernization, strengthening the productive apparatus, and transforming the State and its institutions in order that they may be effectively placed at the service of society, which is in line with practices of the ILO, giving special attention to the needs of the weakest and most vulnerable groups.

Our country today has as President of the Republic, the son of a statesman who in 1949 abolished the triumphal army of National Liberation, and moreover constitutionally abolished the army as a permanent institution. From this struggle there emerged a new generation which founded the Second Republic inspired by the principles of social justice and freedom we had inherited. Therefore today, on behalf of my Government, I can assure you of our commitment to cooperate with the ILO in its vital mission so that together with economic growth, we can ensure social development in harmony with the environment and without discrimination against women, or the exploitation of children.

The Government of Costa Rica has five principal aims: to advance towards greater integration and more opportunities in society; sustainable development; an economy integrated into the world to the world markets; to improve strategy and consultation; and to promote a more participative democracy. We view with optimism and enthusiasm the statement made by the Director-General, citing social justice as one of the ILO's fundamental values. Our Government has committed itself to seeking economic stability as the basis for healthy development through reducing our fiscal deficit, and resulting from the restructuring of public expenditure and the strengthening of the tax administration. Equally we intend to create an economy which will be efficient and integrated as a basis for the competitivity so necessary for integration in world markets. To this end we shall concentrate on four main areas: strengthening and supporting efficient and modern cooperatives; transforming small businesses and the small-scale entrepreneur; seeking to grant easy access to shares in business and supporting the modernization of labour organizations.

In particular, our Government feels that the organization of workers in the form which they feel is most appropriate is the right of every citizen of our country and a fundamental element for strengthening our democracy. Here specifically, the Government will support the development of labour organizations, encouraging their independence from political organizations and from the State. It also supports the transformation severance pay into the right of every worker and will put our Labour Code and other legislation dealing with labour relations up for discussion and revision in order to modernize them and make them instruments able to create a society which enjoys greater democracy, prosperity, justice and solidarity.

Naturally, therefore, we share the view expressed by the Director-General in that we should promote better conditions of work and combat all forms of exploitation of the workers. Here I wish to point out that the Government of Costa Rica has made a great deal of progress in the sphere of labour in that it has ratified 49 Conventions, and a further 30 are before Parliament for ratification.

Finally, I would like to highlight the fact that our Government believes that developed countries enjoy certain comparative advantages as compared with developing countries which may put the latter at a disadvantage in terms of market competitivity in our multipolar world, and also may make it more expedient for freer trade to emerge as a way of stimulating economic development, improving living and working conditions and creating employment. For this reason the Government of Costa Rica intends qualitatively to improve human resources which are the basis of productivity and competitive capacity so that we may become truly integrated in world markets.

In addition to improvements in education and public health, we will transform the productive apparatus making it a suitable financial system for investment, and universal access to credit, and we will encourage scientific and technological training for workers and employers. In this way our Government will reflect the raison d'être of the ILO, that is to say to contribute to universal and lasting peace, through the promotion of development and social justice.

We fully share the hopes expressed by the Director-General that the ILO be the social conscience of the world, and of the United Nations system, and endorse his proposals that we should work together, and expand the fora whereby debate and technical cooperation among member States may be encouraged. It is therefore with great satisfaction on behalf of the Government of Costa Rica, that I reaffirm our commitment, as expressed in our national anthem that under the blue skies of our homeland "peace and work may live forever".

Original French: Mrs. SMET (Minister of Employment and Labour, Belgium) – 1994 and 1995 are important years for the United Nations and the International Labour Organization.

The first invites us to seriously reflect, at the dawn of a new century, upon social development throughout the world. The United Nations has proposed to support it by way of productive employment, and by combating poverty and social integration.

These themes correspond in fact to the major social challenges accompanying the current economic changes taking place worldwide. Belgium hopes that the World Summit for Social Development to be held in Copenhagen in March 1995 will result in significant and operational conclusions which will benefit the international organizations.

The Belgium Government is fully aware of the importance of these challenges at a time when international trade has been given new impetus as a result of the Marrakesh agreements concluding the Uruguay Round, and at a time when there is widespread unemployment of a structural nature in many countries, and on-going immense poverty in many others. It is indeed an extremely apposite context for the ILO.

The Report of the Director-General has been studied and commented on in Belgium and elsewhere, especially within the European Union, as an important contribution, novel on several points, to these reflections. The Conference should help to expand the role of the ILO in the panoply of decisive political, economic and social strategies which are necessary at this time, in order to adopt a balanced approach to the economic and social problems of development.

We must do all we can to reverse the very dismal trend in employment which was described in the last ILO World Labour Report. The strategies to be applied must give priority to the creation of a framework for the development of productive employment.

I learned about the success of the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level of Employment held on 10 June. It was most opportune and I am very pleased about the support shown for the ILO to examine more regularly the global employment situation.

This discussion has shown the interdependence between employment and other policies and has revealed the need, at the international level, for effective consultation between the social partners to facilitate the smooth functioning of the international economic system.

But these strategies can only offer lasting guarantees of social justice if they are based on the careful promotion of fundamental social rights. These are the last strongholds of social justice in this era of economic globalization where everything in every country revolves around the success of economic adjustment policies. Many of these rights are enshrined in international Conventions and in several modern Constitutions. It would be absurd, and destabilizing in the long run, to base ourselves on the assumption that we should temporarily stop promoting fundamental rights.

I would like to stress the importance of the widespread integration of internationally guaranteed economic and social rights at the national level. On the occasion of its revision, on 12 February 1994, fundamental economic, social and cultural rights were incorporated into the Belgian Constitution, including the right to work and to the free choice of profession, the right to remuneration and to fair working conditions, the right to information, consultation and collective bargaining and the right to social security.

I would like to mention the standard-setting activity of the ILO. It should not be an end in itself but a way of achieving the ILO's objectives. This activity is important in that it provides a reference system to encourage greater social justice.

To remain influential, this standard-setting activity should not aim at quantity but at relevance, adaptation to technical progress and to changes in the labour world, and to its fundamental concerns, bearing in mind the real possibilities of States. It should not be questionable from the point of view of employment policy. The ILO should pay particular attention to the ratification of its Conventions if it is not to become a museum of ineffective social awareness. The ILO must make a point of vigorously defending its most important Conventions, that is those which give impetus to social development, and in particular those on freedom of association and the promotion of collective bargaining, the prohibition of forced labour, in particular of forced child labour, and non-discrimination. We are ready to study proposals to strengthen ILO supervisory activities.

The Government hopes that the Convention on part-time work which is being finalized this year, will be drawn up with a view to facilitating its ratification. The 75th anniversary Convention – has this possibility been taken into consideration? It should provide a double signal.

Firstly, it should take into account the criticism addressed regarding the most recent standards in order to render them ratifiable.

Secondly, with this Convention, the ILO is showing that it can adapt to changes in the labour world. Part-time work has now lost its negative image, but it must be protected. In a country such as mine, there is still room for it to be developed. The Convention confirms the essential rules regarding legal protection for part-time workers: firstly, part-time workers should be given the same or equivalent protection as regards collective labour relations, health, security, the right to work and also as regards the main principles of labour law, such as maternity protection; next, remuneration should be identical to that of full-time workers, with the proper proportions of benefits being respected.

In my country, Belgium, these principles are already enshrined in laws and have been recognized by the social partners for the past ten years. The same goes for social security. However, there are thresholds in order to ensure guarantees for the financing of schemes. Here again, legislation in Belgium has been progressively adjusted in order to satisfy this principle.

Finally, employment policies should remove obstacles to the development of part-time work and should ensure the right of workers to choose freely.

In Belgium, two measures have been taken or are currently under discussion. On the one hand, the social partners have been invited to negotiate plans to share available work, where part-time work will not be imposed, but simply made available; on the other hand, I have submitted to the social partners a proposal on the reasons for a possible refusal to grant part-time work.

A series of ratifications is currently under way in Belgium. This work has shown how fragile the justification of non-ratification can be and how important it is for the ILO to remain vigilant and to carry out studies to examine why Conventions are not being ratified. The supervision of standards should provide valuable lessons. It is very important to verify the authority of the standard-setting actions of the ILO.

I have noticed that the most important ILO Conventions have been recognized as steadfast in most recent discussions on the possibility of a social clause in trade and development agreements. This is a considerable achievement. In this debate, I support a multilateral approach because it is the best way of respecting the ILO's specific role and of retaining the authority of its supervisory bodies. The Belgian Government will examine with great interest all methods proposed which could guarantee the cooperation of other international institutions.

We fear the diversification of unilateral or multilateral initiatives which could be undertaken elsewhere if the ILO is no longer in a position to really discuss the issue of the social clause within its framework and to propose a method, before discussing it with other partners.

This shortcoming seems paradoxical as the ILO has the benefit of tripartism. I note that the ICFTU, the WCL and ETUC were able to reach an agreement on the social clause, and this will greatly benefit the discussion: I have also noticed changes in the positions of some employers' organizations, not to mention initiatives which have already been taken by individual or multinational societies.

I would lastly like to mention that on 10 May 1994 and on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO, Belgium signed a tripartite declaration. (This text is available from my delegation and has been distributed.)

In the course of this discussion, it has become clear that the ILO cannot limit itself to simply monitoring its labour and social security Conventions. The ILO has also to participate in the design and evaluation of economic reform programmes.

Of course, the success of these programmes will depend on the organization, the political goodwill and the self-criticism of the governments concerned, on the groups and majorities supporting these programmes, and also on consultation between social partners. I encourage the ILO to persevere in this direction. I invite it to continue to inform us more extensively on the conditions and the results of structural adjustment programmes and to discuss the matter regularly in the appropriate fora.

On a more general note, I hope that this year's Conference will be able to bring about lasting conclusions and I am convinced, Mr. President, that this will be possible under your guidance.

(Mr. Mendoza takes the Chair.)

Original Arabic: Mr. M'KAISSI (Employers' adviser, Tunisia) – For reasons beyond his control, Mr. Jilani has had to return to Tunis to attend the summit conference and has asked me to address the Conference in his place.

On my own behalf and on behalf of the employers of Tunisia, I have pleasure in congratulating Mr. Gray on his election to the chair of this session. We wish him every success in conducting the remainder of our proceedings with the assistance of the Vice-Presidents of the Conference.

I also congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, and all his assistants on the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization; I wish them every success in their work for a better future.

We reaffirm our support for continued pursuit of the aims laid down by the founders of the Organization and for tripartism. We look forward to greater solidarity in dealing with world economic changes and regional changes that call for vigilance and determination and action to meet the challenges that confront us every day.

In this connection, the International Labour Organization has a duty – in view of its constituents and in accordance with its Constitution which assigns it the task of working for world peace and social reform and justice – to support all the social partners, to seek convergence of views, to enhance production and productivity, to provide opportunities to discuss all matters of major importance and to keep abreast of all political and economic changes occurring in the world.

We must bear in mind that the Conventions adopted by the International Labour Organization have become the barometer of social progress and relations between the social partners and a criterion of social development and respect for international instruments in the fields of labour and employment.

We must also bear in mind that the constructive tripartite cooperation that is a prominent feature of basic programmes and active partnership is supported by high-level experts in all fields and is based on advanced technology to which all organizations of employers and workers attach the greatest importance, thus demonstrating their firm intention to offer the best employment conditions so that all professional and trade union organizations may play their coordinating role and accomplish their tasks to best effect.

Taking as its point of departure the basic principles underlying the ILO's action, which is based on dialogue between the social partners, and convinced of the effectiveness of collective bargaining, Tunisia, like other countries, is keen to create a favourable climate that guarantees a decent standard of living for all its citizens. All concerned, without exception, are committed to the goal of permanent social peace based on a sense of responsibility and of civic pride within a cultural and civilizational context. The policy of the new regime has laid the basis for major progress in development and the introduction of social protection for all categories and all occupations in the framework of structured social security systems, while at the same time seeking to ensure that those systems maintain the requisite financial balance and are able to fulfil their current and future obligations

I should also like to mention the important role played by Tunisian enterprises in social protection, not to mention the additional benefits they offer their employees to ensure their security and thus help create a balanced atmosphere at work. This in turn guarantees the longevity of the enterprise by enabling it to overcome obstacles more easily in a climate of understanding and cooperation. All the partners in production try to make the enterprise advance and to maintain its achievements, because the enterprise is the main element of social progress and social stability.

I am certain that the Organization will pay due attention to this question. It has shown in the past that it is capable through its activities of finding appropriate solutions to all social problems.

I could not possibly forget to mention the pioneering role played by the Organization in improving labour legislation and reaffirming the principles of tripartism and dialogue between the parties as a means to encourage development. This activity also aims at ensuring that labour and other legislation advances in such a way that it defends the interests of enterprises, which are an active agent of development and a source of jobs. It also aims at ensuring that enterprises can create a climate conducive to ensuring the quality and competitiveness of their production in an atmosphere of constructive dialogue in which human resources are protected. The latter are, after all, the end and the means of any development.

The changes which have taken place on the international scene might have very profound consequences on employment and on the emerging new world order. We must support economic reforms and the liberalization of trade. The ILO must therefore develop new threefold strategy covering its basic postulates, its organization and its means of action so that it becomes an ideal framework for coordination and development in the light of changing world circumstances.

The International Labour Organization is celebrating its 75th anniversary at a time when a historic event, a harbinger of hope for the whole of humanity, draws us together. I refer to the elimination of apartheid in South Africa, a country that has begun a new stage in its development, casting off all traces of racism, uniting all constituents of its society and creating a climate of justice, freedom and democracy. We hope that in joining our Organization it will continue to engage in joint action for the benefit of humankind. We also rejoice at the progress that is being made towards peace in the Middle East, which will enable the Palestinian people to exercise its right to self-determination. This is a new era that will allow the Palestine Liberation Organization to continue its work aimed at the successful building of its fledgling State in a climate of security and cooperation among all those who live in the region.

Allow me, on behalf of the Pan African Employers' Confederation and on my own behalf, to extend greetings to the people of South Africa, its leaders, its parties and its trade unions. We offer them our very best wishes for progress, development and prosperity in a context of national unity. I should also like to congratulate the Palestinian people who ratified the agreement on Gaza and Jericho. We hope that it is only a first step pending the establishment of an independent Palestinian State so that peace prevails in the Middle East.

Mrs. CONFESOR (Secretary of Labor and Employment, Philippines) – We would like to extend our warmest congratulations on the President's election to the presidency of this Conference on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of this Organization.

May I also extend our congratulations to the Employer Vice-President, Mr. Mohammed Ali Ould Sidi of Mauritania, and the Worker Vice-President, Mr. Democrito Mendoza of the Philippines, who have, like the President, remained a strong and vital pillar of the trade union movement not only in their respective countries but in the international labour community as well.

On behalf of my delegation and Government, may I also congratulate the Sultanate of Oman, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan on their new membership of the ILO and, of course, the Republic of South Africa on the resumption of their membership.

We must congratulate the Director-General for a Report that seeks to build on the strengths and achievements of the ILO since 1919 in the promotion of social justice and the protection of workers' rights. It analyses the basic weaknesses of the present in the areas of standards, services and policy-making; explores the possibilities for an enabling environment that would enhance the empowerment of peoples and nations in a new world order; and equally proposes bold action to ensure that the fundamental ILO values are defended and made secure in these circumstances.

Free trade and economic globalization promote economic development, provide much-needed jobs and incomes and, ultimately, alleviate poverty. But there is no guarantee that social justice will be defended. And that is where the ILO finds itself today – at a crossroads, and this is true for every member State.

Achieving the right balance between standards and development, between employment and protection is a difficult, but not an impossible, task.

The Organization must be revitalized as a source of information and creative and innovative options and as a unique forum where issues affecting the three social partners can and must be debated by them.

We support the proposals that seek to broaden and deepen the participation of the member States and the social partners and to shorten, of course, the period for decision-making when possible.

The generation of productive and freely chosen employment remains the major challenge for both developed and developing countries.

The proposal to rename the Organization "the International Organization for Employment and Labour" should be given serious consideration, if only to highlight and direct more accurately our own responsibilities and give our activities a higher profile in the public eye. Combining employment and labour, as proposed, would also have the advantage of obliging us to find acceptable compromises and innovative solutions when the demands of one or the other appear to be incompatible.

The Philippine Department of Labor and Employment was so renamed in 1978, and for exactly the same reasons. The ILO, as with my department as renamed, does not create jobs, but promotes and provides advice in the formulation of economic policies and programmes that seek to generate those jobs. It ensures that the social dimension is an inherent consideration of economic and political decisions of a nation and of groups of nations.

Over the past decade, we have begun a major rethinking: for a country suffering from high levels of unemployment and underemployment, employment promotion and generation must be the major objective and not a mere consequence that would trickle down from major economic decisions. A strategy of more direct intervention by government and greater participation by the private sector is continuing to be implemented in my country to cope with the effects of economic liberalization.

The informal ministerial meeting on employment called during this Conference must be followed up at the regional and sectoral levels as well. The search for compromises and solutions will also be greatly enhanced by ensuring that employment be made a permanent subject of the Conference agenda.

A major report by the Office should be made annually to the Conference on the effects of specific economic, financial, fiscal and trade policy on labour and employment, particularly on the poorer and vulnerable categories of workers, as well as nations, regions and sectors. The report should also include an analysis of alternative strategies by countries at reconciling the equally valid objectives of employment creation, growth and stability on the one hand, and welfare and the improvement of living and working conditions on the other.

The ASEAN resolution, as well as the statements made by some of the ILO constituents in previous days, registers the major concern that the social clause may permit the indirect introduction of obstacles to trade which would replace those recently eliminated by the new World Trade Organization.

For the countries with young economies which have bravely decided in favour of liberalization, the social clause may present another opportunity to use labour rights as a trade barrier against their interests as they attempt to adapt gradually their economies and regulations to the standards of justice attained by the more developed countries. This subject should be tackled with the full participation of the Members of the ILO, including the three social partners. Clauses should not be divorced and cannot be divorced from the standard-setting activities of the ILO and the tripartite manner in which decisions must be adopted.

The pressure to use penalties rather than moral persuasion or cooperation should strengthen our resolve to ensure that through the latter economic development results in better working and living conditions for everyone.

The "soft law" approach proposed in the Report is most innovative, as it addresses the need to achieve the right balance between the universality of standards and the reciprocity and specificity of national experiences.

Let us avoid an approach that would cast developed nations as adversaries of developing nations. It would be more productive to conceive of areas of cooperation meant to strengthen particular nations when they are weak and sustain them when they are strong.

Technical cooperation and the ILO's concept of active partnership represent a challenge and a hope for those who have encountered great difficulties in coping with increasing poverty and unemployment. Technical cooperation cannot be made subject to conditions, and not even to simple compliance with ILO standards, because it is precisely to resolve problems related to the application of standards that member States need the support of this Organization.

The issues that confront the ILO today are most relevant to us in my country. We are, however, a little more fortunate today as we seek to achieve development and democracy.

Due to the economic stabilization and political stability we have achieved since the 1986 revolution, the range of options to alleviate poverty and unemployment has widened. This, of course, is constantly threatened by the very same international economic order that now provides us the opportunities for growth. We are achieving growth with democracy. It is a little too slow for some of my countrymen, but it is there none the less.

Our ability to provide higher standards of living and better paying jobs requires an ever-expanding economy. Social justice must be promoted at every level of expansion. Each minuscule increase in growth must also be reflected in better incomes and lives.

I am pleased to report to all that for the first time in many years my country's economic growth rate for the first quarter of this year of 4.8 per cent exceeded the very targets we had set for ourselves. The signs of recovery exist: a booming equity market, rising export earnings, our successful return to the international capital markets and declining interest rates. The unemployment rate has not increased with the increase in the generation of jobs, especially in industry and the services sectors. Per capita income has also increased.

As my President, His Excellency Fidel V. Ramos, has announced, the Philippines is really back in business in the heart of Asia.

A national employment programme, including an aggressive expanded manpower development programme, is being implemented alongside an economic development programme. Social reforms, such as the expansion of education and health services and the social security systems, are also part of this programme.

Labour and employer leaders have participated in a series of multi-sectoral summits that have forged some consensus, balancing and prioritizing seemingly contradictory objectives. This is reflected in the social dimension which has been brought to bear on trade and economic policies and strategies.

We have also achieved a measure of industrial peace without the withdrawal of certain workers' rights. A policy of "no cheap labour" has also been clearly enunciated by the President, especially for those who have unsuccessfully tried to manoeuvre the country into using cheap labour as its major and only competitive advantage. Instead, the strategy is to develop and enhance the capabilities of the Filipino workforce, which is presently globally competitive and in possession of world class skills.

We have, much like the ILO, embarked on a bold programme of reform amending the Labour Code of 1974. Tripartite consultations, as well as analysis by experts in the different fields of labour and employment, trade and investments, will provide us with a broad range of options to face the challenges of a new world order.

Two days ago our President, His Excellency Fidel V. Ramos, in his speech to celebrate our Independence Day, renewed his and his nation's vow to adhere to the principles of democracy. Democracy has and will continue, not only in keeping our citizens free, but also in enabling them to organize the economy for self-sustaining growth.

My President could have been talking about the ILO when he said that government must also ensure that its actions, and I quote: "are not too short, too tentative, too timid – so as to exhaust people's patience and their trust in the process of reform itself".

In conclusion, may I express the following message on behalf of my delegation. For all of us here, we must have faith and courage in our ability to achieve. We must individually and collectively promote the ILO's renewal and become as young, tough and energized as when this Organization was founded in 1919.

Original French: Mr. PEIRENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium) – "Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda", that is in fact the subtitle of the Report of the Director-General submitted upon the 75th anniversary of the Organization.

If I refer to the subtitle, it is because it summarizes the Programme of Action of the Organization by referring to the essential elements of social justice.

It is in the light of this both historical and present objective that we are participating in discussions today, not to engage in an intellectual exercise for the umpteenth time but rather prepare the groundwork.

Globalization has taken root and is developing in an anarchic fashion, which can only lead to more frequent and harsh confrontations, as well as conflicts of interests.

The absence of an international body of regulations is likely to lead States and regions to seek refuge in unlimited competition in order to attract investment to their territory.

Towards this end, they have recourse to supplementary deregulation, dismantling of current social concertation and anti-trade union repression, as well as tax breaks.

At the 23rd Congress of the World Confederation of Labour in Mauritius in November 1993, we highlighted the fact that the single path of economic liberalism is too narrow for human development. "Unless adequate measures are taken at short notice, including measures aimed at the transition to a better world economy, the people and the poorest sections in the first place, will be victimized again."

Certain circles are nevertheless of the opinion that the time has come to wage all-out war against social policies and against the positions of its actors, that is to say workers' and employers' organizations, as well as public authorities.

All these developments are obviously having a tangible effect on the operation of the ILO, and more particularly on standard-setting policy.

International labour standards are often discredited in a general sense. They are seen as being outdated and especially considered as obstacles to growth and employment, as well as to the implementation of modern policies in line with market realities.

Therefore, it is essential first and foremost to restore the effectiveness of the universal scope of labour standards.

This certainly applies to the Conventions which the ILO classifies as fundamental labour standards, as well as those which relate to freedom of association and free access to collective bargaining, the abolition of child labour and forced labour, and a ban on discrimination at work, all of which should be placed in a World Charter for Workers' Rights.

Secondly, supervision of labour standards should be strengthened. Although present ILO procedures have achieved some success, extensively based as they are on collaboration, technical assistance and dialogue, they will be insufficient as long as countries and enterprises knowingly snub the ILO. Hence our proposals and the common stand taken by the World Confederation of Labour, the ICFTU and the ETUC as regards the social clauses. We consider the social clauses as one of the instruments to ensure respect for the universally recognized fundamental standards which we have just referred to. They are in no way a protectionist instrument, nor a self-seeking unilateral action as certain governments claim they are.

To refuse to strengthen the application of these essential standards is tantamount to refusing any ethical basis for the economy; to refuse this concept of the positive social clause is to reduce humans to the status of a machine, human labour to merchandise.

To refuse to link standards to international trade, as has been proposed by certain governments at this Conference, leads us to think that these governments are not opposed to forced labour nor to child labour, and that they tolerate discrimination. They are opposed to the fact that tripartism and freedom of association can be the driving force for social economics, guaranteeing the redistribution of income which is necessary for sustained economic development.

This leads us directly to what we consider to be the second priority for the ILO: to promote employment. The Director-General recalls quite rightly that the ILO should not deal solely with the right to work but also with the opportunity to find employment. Application of Convention No. 122 leaves much to be desired. We therefore expect the ILO to act and to show proof of its creativity and optimize technical assistance as well as the needed synergy with other international actors, but also that it should ensure that the right to work does not end up being tomorrow's work without rights.

The third priority involves the promotion of tripartism. Despite flaws and certain weak points, the ILO has managed to maintain its effectiveness in the field, owing to its tripartite method.

This effectiveness is further highlighted at the very moment when the United Nations system is undergoing a serious crisis of credibility because of its ambiguous relevance.

But we cannot remain blind to attempts to reduce tripartite action, or even joint action, to merely cooperation at the enterprise level. In its general survey of the freedom of association and collective bargaining, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations declares forthright that trade union activities and social concertation cannot be limited at the enterprise level, but instead should be applied to every level and every aspect of social and economic policy.

Social concertation guarantees in the long run the democratic aspects of society as well as the necessary social infrastructure for implementing a viable social and economic policy. Moreover, tripartism is an economic method which is economically effective.

The fourth priority is one of institution strategic priority.

The Director-General asks if we wish to see the ILO expand its international role in accordance with the Declaration of Philadelphia.

This apparently rhetorical question is nevertheless a pressing issue. In fact the World Social Summit next year as well as the forthcoming creation of the World Trade Organization will represent a decisive turning point as regards the political and legal framework of the world economic system.

It is in this context that we must affirm and reaffirm the role of the ILO. In his Report the Director-General insists that the ILO should tend its own garden and not that of others. We fully agree with that position, though pointing out that this also applies to other gardeners.

The ILO must be the social pivotal point of the new institutional system. The ILO should also be the social crossroads as regards trade, economics, development, the environment, and crop raising. The ILO should also be the social software in the context of the United Nations. The ILO should also be at the centre of social policies and not relegated to being in the legal tool box which is trotted out when necessary.

We appeal to governments to recognize the unique and indispensable place of the ILO in the social sphere, to ensure that the efficiency of its tripartism, is recognized, and that its objectives be anchored on institutional concertation.

Finally, I cannot end without referring to the signature of a tripartite statement on 10 May this year in Brussels where workers' and employers' organizations as well as Belgian public authorities reaffirmed their commitment to the ILO and its objectives. They made a joint plea for the adoption of instruments such as the social clause in order to strengthen the actions of the ILO in the future.

In addition to these declarations and statements, we would like to assure you of our continuing commitment in practice and we assure you of our active contribution to the Workers' group and to the services of the ILO in order to modernize our actions and take up the joint challenge of achieving social justice at the heart of the world economy.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MENDOZA) – It is now my pleasure to give the floor to Mr. Al-Eissai Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Oman. We would like to welcome and congratulate Oman as a new Member of the ILO family.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-EISSAI (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Oman) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is a great pleasure for me to participate in the proceedings of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. His Majesty Sultan Qaboos Bin Said has asked me to convey his greetings to you all and his best wishes for the success of the Conference.

I wish to say a special word of thanks to the President and the delegations who have welcomed my country as a new Member of the International Labour Organization. I also warmly congratulate the President on his election. I am sure that, God willing, his conduct of the proceedings of the Conference will guarantee the success of this session. I also wish to take this opportunity to extend heartfelt thanks to the President of the previous session.

I am very pleased to note that the official admission of the Sultanate of Oman as a Member of the International Labour Organization coincides with the 75th anniversary of the ILO's foundation and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which reaffirmed the goals of this Organization, set forth the principles to which it subscribes and called for action to ensure prosperity for all human beings, regardless of race, creed or gender.

Given that work is one of the noblest religious duties and guides human beings along the right path in life, it is natural for States to work for continuous improvement and modernization of labour legislation with a view to improving working conditions as a basic prerequisite for economic well-being and the development, progress and prosperity of societies.

The introduction of labour legislation in the Sultanate of Oman since the beginning of the country's great revival led by His Majesty the Sultan from 23 July 1970 has gone hand in hand with modernization and continuous progress in the country as a whole. I should like to draw attention in this connection to some of the provisions of this legislation, which guarantees a wage commensurate with the type and quality of a person's work, fixes working hours, provides for paid weekly and annual leave, sickness, disability and old-age benefits and compensation for industrial accidents. There are also special provisions governing the employment of women and young people.

This legislation is consistent with the Sultanate's aim to provide a free, decent and secure life for all workers and with the goals of the Arab Labour Organization and the ILO. The Sultanate intends to continue its efforts in that connection with a view to making further progress at both the Arab and international levels in order to enhance the potential of the sector and its effectiveness in activating and developing society and moving it towards progress and prosperity.

In the field of social security, the State is engaged in continuous action to organize employment and training in such a way as to guarantee material and psychological stability for workers. In addition to the benefits I have already mentioned, compensation for industrial accidents, disability, death, old-age and sickness benefits, labour legislation provides for social insurance, a scheme that came into force in 1992 for workers with permanent contracts. Such insurance has now become a basic right guaranteed to workers as protection against social risks, especially old age, disability, death and industrial accidents. Moreover, social insurance is not just a humanitarian requirement but a basic social and economic necessity that all countries, irrespective of regime, are seeking to achieve. Economic prosperity and social development increase in line with the living standards and health of the individual members of society.

In response to the economic revival under way in the Sultanate and the existence of effective labour market demand as a direct result of the application of the principle of diversification of sources of revenue and the setting up of new industrial, commercial and agricultural activities, the Government of the Sultanate has adopted a scientific approach to the training of the labour force to meet the country's needs for various kinds of expertise and technical skills and to prepare studies and field research into conditions and trends on the labour market and factors influencing its development, wage levels, productivity, the size and characteristics of the national labour force and changes in its composition due to education and training in the country. The Government has set up a number of multidisciplinary vocational training colleges and has converted some of them into technical faculties equipped to train professionals in the technical and administrative fields.

The Sultanate is seeking to provide the requisite insurance for workers in the private sector in order to guarantee stable relations between employees and employers in accordance with the Labour Code. This in turn has a favourable impact on production and creates a climate conducive to better human relations between the social partners based on mutual respect. It also means that labour disputes, whether initiated by workers or employers, can be settled in a balanced way in accordance with the legal provisions in force.

In the light of the changes in social and economic circumstances in the country since the promulgation of the first labour law in 1973, a new labour code has been proposed to deal with the overall change in the labour system.

The agenda of the 81st Session covers a wide range of important subjects but I wish to make special mention of the ILO's constructive efforts to ensure proper protection for workers in mines and quarries. We agree with the International Labour Office on the measures needed to reduce the incidence of industrial accidents and occupational diseases. These measures will also yield economic benefits for employers and governments in terms of greater productivity and a reduction in compensation payments. We also approve of the endeavour to adopt new international standards laying down general principles for the protection of workers against occupational risks and the reduction of the risks to workers' health and well-being to a minimum.

We also agree with the view that private employment agencies contribute on the whole to the efficiency and stability of the labour market and to creating a better balance in market conditions.

On behalf of my delegation, I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate South Africa on its great victory in achieving social justice and equality for all citizens.

I wish this Conference every success and I pray that God may guide our proceedings so that we adopt constructive resolutions that make a major contribution towards strengthening and consolidating the work of the ILO and its effective role in the service of the social partners.

May God grant us success.

Mr. BALOPI (Minister of Labour and Home Affairs, Botswana) – Allow me on behalf of the Botswana delegation and on my own behalf to congratulate the President, for the honour bestowed on him and the Vice-Presidents in having been entrusted with guidance of the deliberations of this historic 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

The Conference is historic in that we are meeting at a time when significant events are taking place globally. Here, at the ILO, we are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the ILO, as well as the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Recently, in April, we witnessed the birth of a new democratic South Africa. The transition to democracy in that country no doubt represents a clear-cut victory of good over evil. The abolition of apartheid in South Africa and the transition to democracy will have an important bearing on the ILO: the Conference will, in line with the November 1993 decision of the ILO Governing Body to suspend the policy on action against apartheid, have to give directions on the fate of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, as well as the Committee on Apartheid. Other equally momentous events have taken place.

Recently, at Marrakesh in Morocco, we witnessed the culmination of protracted Uruguay Round of talks in the establishment of concrete liberal trade agreements declaring the world market as one common place. The Conference will also have to examine very carefully the decision of the Marrakesh Conference to leave labour and social matters out of trade agreements. Such an exclusion is welcome, for there are fora where these issues can be better and expertly addressed. We believe the ILO is the right forum.

As we commemorate the 75th anniversary of our Organization, we are privileged that we have at our disposal a very candid guiding document in the form of the Director-General's Report which poses very pertinent questions as to how we ought to define a common vision, not only for our Organization but also for the improvement of the daily life of our fellow men.

While a reinvigorated Organization such as the ILO will endeavour to continue to defend its principles and objectives as well as the values it espouses, it also has to recognize, accept and associate itself with the positive changes that are globally taking place.

The Director-General's Report, Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda contains critical questions which need the Conference's serious consideration. One wonders whether a general debate in plenary is the right forum to address such specific issues and to provide clear policy guidelines for the future orientation of the ILO. Maybe special committees should be established to address these issues in greater detail.

I concur with the argument that the ILO has the duty to promote the dignity of the working people by combating all forms of exploitation and thus espousing social justice. This has been done through a labour code in the form of international labour standards. It is therefore important to examine the relevance of these international standards in a world that is clearly sending out a message of deregulation.

I believe in the ILO: it has been chiefly responsible for framing international legislation in the social field, and has therefore done a commendable job. There is no cause for panic. In that context, the ILO remains the social conscience of the international community and I strongly believe it should so remain. The ILO has over the decades promoted social justice. Key Conventions that immediately come to mind include: the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No.105), the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No.100), the Freedom of Associate and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No.87) the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No.122), the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No.138) and many others. The glaring inequalities between States and between regions and even within States have to be continually addressed and the ILO's role in that respect remains pivotal.

Admittedly, what the ILO can do internally is to undertake a review of the relevance of existing Conventions. Such a review should indicate whether there is a need to revoke, amend or modify some of these Conventions. What we should not lose sight of is the fact that social matters will need to be continually addressed in the aftermath of the Marrakesh Conference. The ILO should authoritatively take up this assignment.

The issue of whether the ILO should now stop adopting international labour standards does not arise because, with development, new situations will develop that will need to be discussed and where it is deemed necessary to adopt international standards in the form of Conventions or Recommendations.

Most of the developing countries are implementing structural adjustment programmes which have not taken into account the social impact of such programmes. The need to continue to honour debt obligations by these countries is a foregone conclusion. However, I wish to call upon the Director-General to ensure that social and labour matters, rightly excluded from the Marrakesh trade agreements, are urgently studied and member States are provided with the technical information as to the merits and demerits of their inclusion in the trade policies.

The other area that needs our examination is what role the ILO should play in a world that is characterized by innovation in economic and social affairs. Is the choice of the ILO significant in shaping international policy in that regard? No doubt the ILO has played a significant role in assisting member States by providing expert advice in areas of drafting labour legislation, setting up social security systems, employment policies and others. However, the ILO seems to have lagged behind in terms of shaping international policy. For example, the exclusion of social aspects in structural adjustment programmes is one such case in point.

In a fast-changing world, member countries expect the ILO to be a source of reference on issues such as mobility of finance, transferability of manufacturing capacity, the movement of labour, the free movement of goods, etc. This means that the Research Branch of the ILO will have to be improved to handle technical issues that may have been outside the normal activities of the ILO in the past.

We have to applaud the Director-General for recognizing this weakness of the ILO and for requesting the Conference to give his Office the mandate to engage in the free interplay of ideas, the examination of problems and issues without preconceptions. At the same time, member States should declare their readiness to accept and respond to constructive criticism.

This Conference should therefore mandate the Governing Body and the Office to explore means of strengthening the ILO organs by enhancing their intellectual capacity to facilitate the ILO playing such a role.

Linked to the above is the ILO's innovative active partnership policy in Africa which will be executed by multidisciplinary advisory teams set up in five African subregions. The multidisciplinary advisory teams, while executing technical cooperation activities, will ensure that the needs and priorities of the recipient countries are quickly and adequately addressed while at the same time assisting in capacity building. It is therefore logical that, with the ILO rendering policy advice at national and regional levels it should, of necessity, have a greater influence in international policy-making.

I wish to end on a happy note by welcoming South Africa, our dear neighbours and our worker neighbours, to the ILO after three decades of isolation. As I said at the beginning, the transition in South Africa to democracy represents a clear victory of good over evil. Apartheid may be no more, but the battle is not over as we begin the reconstruction of post-apartheid South Africa. The international community has to play a major role in that drive and the ILO, through the active partnership policy, is best suited to render the technical advice so badly needed by South Africa.

In conclusion, my delegation wishes to express its full commitment and support to the President in his effort to steer the deliberations of this Conference to their logical conclusions.

Original French: Mr. BLONDEL (Workers' delegate, France) – Before beginning my address I should like to indicate how satisfied and proud we are to see the President assuming this function. A free and independent trade unionist presiding over the Conference at this time is symbolic. There are in the life of international organizations some moments which are of special importance. This is the case today for the International Labour Organization.

After 75 years, we have accumulated a great deal of experience, greater in fact than other organizations.

After 75 years, we have also earned respect and gained wisdom.

After 75 years we can now look back and see what has been accomplished. The ILO can be proud to have promoted freedom, to have helped spread freedom of association and negotiation, to have contributed to the elimination of apartheid and to have made a case for economic and social development.

We can also rejoice because the ILO since its establishment has succeeded in having freed 10,000 trade unionists in the world.

Seventy-five years is a good age at which to reflect on the future and to identify what needs to be done to strengthen the Organization still further. After nearly four generations of existence, we can afford to extract the essence of the Organization and to concentrate our strengths on it.

In a way the ILO is doing this today.

This thought is based on two major inter-related changes.

To start with, the events which took place in the eastern part of Europe in the 1980s called into question the previous model in this region. It should be pointed out that the ILO played its part in these changes. It played just its part, but it did so fully.

We are no longer living under the system of blocs which had prevailed since the Yalta agreements.

Secondly, the generalized spread of economic liberalism, which has nothing to do with the liberalism of enlightenment has marked the world since the beginning of the 1980s.

Just as the model of the eastern countries became a source of mistreatment and excess in the name of the collective, and eliminated collective and individual freedoms, the new, neo-liberal model has become a source of abuse in the name of the individual, and has sapped the rights of the collective and those of the most disadvantaged individuals.

What we can call the cult of economic liberalism has generated inequality, poverty and unemployment by diminishing the role of the public powers and by promoting the free market as a doctrinaire policy.

The laissez-faire, laissez-passer approach, when applied as a doctrine, leads to a law of the jungle where the weakest are left behind. Organizing them and defending their rights is perceived as rigidity.

In these conditions, the liberalization of markets, deregulation and flexibility, together with the revolution in time and space brought about by technological advances, have given competitiveness the priority over productivity and have placed more importance on the consumer than on the worker.

But consumers have to be in a position to consume!

Such an approach is both socially and economically suicidal.

It is an approach leading to exclusion, austerity and poverty.

And we have seen from our experience throughout the world that poverty is the first foe of democracy.

It is our responsibility to repeat that misery operates in a vicious cycle. It does so materially, but also socially and culturally.

When people can no longer consume, the doors of integration and education shut and illiteracy takes hold.

Tension increases, and people turn to backward ideas and fundamentalism, which in practice thrive off poverty in a perfectly legal manner.

Because of its original objectives of social and economic development, of social justice and peace and of respect for individual and collective freedoms, and because of the international labour standards which are its means and the tripartism which is its specific framework for action, the ILO today has an essential role and a crucial responsibility.

It is its duty to promote at the international level regulatory mechanisms to ensure social progress and fair competition.

The challenge for us is to harmonize upwards while not keeping anyone down.

It is to ensure respect for individuals and peoples and to protect them against arbitrary influences of any kind.

We must meet this challenge, especially if we do not want the ILO to be accused of rigidity and to be taken away from its role and from these objectives.

In a word, we have an opportunity. It is the opportunity mentioned by the Secretary-General of the United Nations in his address of 9 June 1994.

It consists of defending the role of the ILO by promoting it in relations with other international structures, such as the IMF, the World Bank, and the GATT or the World Trade Organization, in the adoption and implementation of social clauses. The words "social clauses" should scare no one.

Contrary to what some may say, the social clause is not aimed at establishing a world minimum wage.

It would be ridiculous and it would be insulting for the members of the Conference to think that this could be the objective.

The social clause is simply and seriously aimed at making sure that international labour standards are effectively respected, particularly as regards freedom of association, the freedom to negotiate, the prohibition of forced labour and child labour and non-discrimination.

Need I recall from this rostrum that this idea stemmed from a high-level conference, that it was initiated some time ago by the Office and by the predecessor of the Director-General, and that it was a consequence of the developing countries' complaints and claims concerning their debt and the tactics of the IMF?

Need I recall that even then we called for the application of standards to be taken into consideration by international financing bodies?

Need I repeat that the countries which appear to fear this initiative are already partially bound to apply these standards?

Finally, need I remind the trade unionists of those countries that we are not practising protectionism, but on the contrary, solidarity, and that we would like to promote the growth of global demand by ensuring more solvency for workers?

Of course, this should be accompanied by practical and progressive measures in which the ILO should play a very important role. But it also implies, for example, that the price-setting mechanisms of raw materials should be reviewed.

It means that the industrialized countries should promise not to use the protectionist tool of flexibility to compete with the developing countries.

It also means we must quickly determine our relationship with the WTO.

In 25 years, the ILO is going to celebrate its 100th anniversary. We must get down to work, so that in the year 2020 those who will participate in the Conference shall be in a position to look with pride on the work carried out by the ILO in the fields of social progress, economic development, social justice and peace.

The ILO has time, its way of working and its international nature on its side. It is now up to us to benefit from it in everyone's interest.

Synergy results more from compromise than from consensus. Life is tension. Discussion, ambition and conviction generate progress.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL GHAZAWY (Government delegate, Jordan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I am particularly happy on behalf of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan and on my own behalf to congratulate the President on the occasion of his election to the Presidency of this International Labour Conference. We wish him full success in his responsibilities and we are convinced that thanks to his efforts we shall succeed in attaining the objectives which we have fixed for ourselves. We are happy to present our congratulations to the Vice-Presidents.

We would also like to congratulate Oman, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and especially South Africa for having joined the International Labour Organization.

With a feeling of friendship, as always during this Conference, I present to you our warmest congratulations, that is to say, to the International Labour Organization on the occasion of its 75th anniversary. This Organization has achieved many of the noble objectives for which it was founded. It has contributed effectively to the creation of democracy, to social well-being, to the improvement of labour legislation, and the defence of freedoms, in the interest of its social partners, all of which has been achieved thanks to cooperation and ongoing dialogue among the various partners.

The Director-General of the ILO in his Report, Defending values, promoting change, raised a particularly delicate and important point.

During this celebration of its 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which is the most important point of departure in setting guidelines for the Organization's activities, the Director-General in his Report raises a number of issues and presents certain theories as regards the manner of regarding future activities by the Organization, whether it is a question of its policies, objectives or programmes – anything which could help the ILO in meeting the challenge of the future and thus adapting to a changing world and global economy, shielded from conflict and contradictions, fostering solidarity and cooperation in order to achieve social justice.

It is useful to examine and to analyse in depth the points to which the Director-General paid particular attention, namely the need for a common vision of social justice and the means necessary to achieve it, and also the need to use the various services of the International Labour Organization in a more flexible and balanced way.

In his Report the Director-General says that the longevity of the ILO is proof of its capacity to adapt to today's and tomorrow's world in order to deal with the inevitable problems that arise and to continue to assist the labour world.

Whilst recognizing the importance of the Report of the Director-General and its noble objectives, we would like to make some observations.

First of all, the deliberations referred to by the Director-General which took place in the framework of the International Labour Conference do come under the ILO's mandate, contrary to what the Director-General maintains, who, we think was referring to the struggle against apartheid and the follow-up of the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. These debates were both important and necessary and they remain so, given that workers and employers in these areas are still living in deplorable social and economic conditions.

Secondly, the supervising of the application of international labour standards which have often been the focus of bitter discussions during the Conference, must be examined seriously, as all issues relating to standards call for in-depth study.

Thirdly, like many others we feel that there should not be a link between the application of standards and the granting of technical cooperation programmes, especially given the nature of current relations between the developed countries and the developing countries which are experiencing economic and labour problems.

Fourthly, the Report of the Director-General tackled the issue of the social clause in international trade relation as defined in the most recent GATT agreements. It is to be hoped that the application of this agreement will not undermine the interests of developing countries.

Fifthly, the Report clearly describes the challenges that the labour world must take up to guarantee social gains and to create jobs.

Attention should be paid to the negative effects of the debt and to its consequences, such as restructuring and economic reform programmes. Another challenge is to stimulate growth in order to create jobs in a world where capital movements are entirely unregulated and where the principles of social justice are being eroded.

We believe that these are truths that we should dwell on, all the more so given that we are meeting here at the ILO, which is the social conscience of the world.

Still in relation to the Report of the Director-General, we would like to say that we must attend to the most disadvantaged sectors of the population and avoid social and economic divisions, and all the resulting tensions. In this connection, the Jordanian Government has promulgated a special Act for the training and employment of the handicapped. We have ratified the Arab Convention on this problem and we are considering the ratification of the international Convention on the same subject.

The Government of my country has also set up special funds to provide the necessary assistance to disadvantaged persons, such as the National Assistance Fund and the Development and Employment Fund.

The Government of my country encourages any initiatives aimed at integrating these disadvantaged categories into society and ensuring their development. In this connection, we commend the ILO's technical assistance, in particular with respect to the Queen Alia Fund for Voluntary Social Action which is supervised by Her Royal Highness Princess Basma Ben Talal, which promotes benevolent social activities.

Jordanians are very proud of their stable country, which is thanks to the policy adopted by His Majesty King Hussein who favours both economic and social global development, political pluralism, the multiparty system and the respect of human rights and of international legitimacy.

I would like to salute the cooperation which exists between my country and the ILO and to express our thanks and gratitude to the Director-General and the members of the Governing Body for all the efforts they have made to improve this cooperation.

Original French: Mr. NORDMANN (Government delegate, Switzerland) – I would first like to congratulate the President upon his election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. My congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents from the ranks of government, employers and workers.

I would also like to thank the staff of the International Labour Office, as well as its Director-General, for their commitment to the work of the Organization throughout this year.

To mark the 75th anniversary of our Organization, the Director-General has devoted his Report to the future role of the ILO in guaranteeing social justice in a globalizing economy. This is a bold Report, containing a wealth of information and suggestions. I would like to congratulate the Director-General on his Report, and even more so for having chosen to show how the ILO can move with the times, both in its action and its philosophy.

It is not enough to say that we are going through a period of deep changes in our economies and our societies, which sometimes challenge our traditional values and the social achievements of which they are based, we must also find answers to the formidable challenges the world faces today – answers adapted to our perpetually changing world.

No country, and no national or international institution can contest the need for a more just world and a more equitable society.

However, reality shows us how difficult it sometimes is to realize this ideal of justice and equity in the economic and political conditions that prevail.

Through the numerous activities it has undertaken relentlessly during the 75 years of its existence, the ILO has been able to ensure a fine balance between the economic and social aspects of its mission.

More than ever the international community today needs a "social foundation" to unite us around common values, to allow us to reconcile the economic demands of an increasingly competitive world with those of a more equitable society.

The ILO must, in future, guarantee this "social foundation", with its specific functions and attributes.

The Director-General's Report offers us an opportunity to consider the resources the Organization should put to play to better respond to the expectations of the international community. I am not going to review them all – not for lack of time – but because my intention is more to indicate the priorities Switzerland would like to see take centre stage in future ILO activities.

As regards the social side of world trade, our Federal Counsellor, Mr. Delamuraz, has already alluded to this key issue for the ILO in his official statement on 7 June. Switzerland would like to see substantive debate on this subject within the ILO to better implement relevant international labour standards without opening the door to protectionism or to sanctions.

The ILO should therefore launch a process of defining the "core" of social rights which are linked with trade, and reflect on the steps to be taken to ensure better implementation of these rights. In this connection, on the whole, Switzerland supports the proposals made by the Director-General. However, it should not be forgotten that Conventions are legally binding only on States which ratify them. We therefore support any search for synergy between the supervisory systems of the two international institutions directly concerned at the world level, namely the World Trade Organization and the ILO.

Standards are and must remain one of the main ways for the ILO to achieve its objectives. With the number of standards it has ratified, and the effort it devotes to their implementation, Switzerland has shown how closely it identifies itself with the basic principles of this Organization, its standard-setting system and the labour code that has been built up over the decades. However, there is no denying that, over recent years, Conventions have become increasingly difficult to ratify and implement in a national context. Switzerland will support any step to define the criteria for drafting new standards that effectively serve the ILO's objectives. For my country, the prime criterion is that the ILO should draw up new standards only if they are absolutely essential.

Second, national administrations of countries present at the Conference should make a special effort to ensure that new standards are drafted in such a way that they can be ratified and implemented by the largest possible number of ILO member States. The Office will, of course, need to give effective back-up in the drafting process, but we cannot hold the Office responsible for any difficulties encountered in applying standards adopted by this Conference – the world's Labour Parliament. In this connection we believe both the Conference committees and plenary should make a special effort to ensure that standards attract a true consensus right from the very first preparatory stage.

Finally, we have to ask whether it is wise to maintain the same tempo of adopting new instruments. Switzerland does not favour legislating in detail right, left and centre. By preference, priority should be given to a systematic revision of existing Conventions, and we will support any effort in that direction. We hope such a revision would group standards together where possible, and open-up new prospects for ratification and implementation by member States. The revision should be done flexibly, without unduly burdensome procedures: for instance, amendment protocols could be adopted, where necessary, to strengthen the conditions for Conventions entering into effect (for example: number of ratifications) or for simplified denunciation.

In the future, the relevance of the ILO's activities will be conditioned by the degree to which this Organization remains a "home base" for all countries of the world. Naturally, since our planet's countries are at such differing stages of development, certain areas – for instance, technical cooperation – need to be targeted at the least privileged countries. Switzerland holds great store in building strong links of solidarity with populations in need: this is why Switzerland has bolstered its commitment to East and Central European countries and has granted greater financial support to the activities of the Turin Centre.

Other developed countries, like Switzerland, all need the ILO. The international instruments of the ILO, adopted and ratified by my country, have built up a minimum body of legislation to which we are profoundly attached. In the policy of deregulation we are applying to various sectors of our economy, the ILO standards provide a point of reference, a threshold below which we must not descend.

New countries are acquiring independence and are seeking international recognition by joining the ILO; some countries have rejoined after many years of absence – I would like to recall here the awe-inspiring message of hope signalled for all of us by South Africa which has now rejoined our ranks; all of this illustrates how much the ILO works in consonance with the times.

Switzerland has confidence in the ILO, and hopes that the Organization will be able to negotiate the turning point for the legitimacy of its action. I can assure you that my country will concentrate on pushing forward true reforms within the ILO so that it can continue in the service of universal welfare and social justice.

Mr. KANYANYA (Minister of Labour and Manpower Development, Malawi) – It gives me great pleasure and honour, on behalf of the Government and the people of the New Republic of Malawi, to be accorded the privilege of addressing this august assembly.

First of all, I would like to convey to you all warm and fraternal greetings from His Excellency the President of the Republic of Malawi, Mr. Bakili Muluzi, and the people of Malawi. I also wish, on behalf of my delegation and indeed on my own behalf, to congratulate the President most sincerely on his well deserved election to preside over the deliberations of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I do believe that with his vast wealth of experience, wisdom and able guidance, he will bring the proceedings of this Conference to a very successful conclusion.

I would like, therefore, to assure the President and the Officers of the Conference, of the confidence we have placed in them and of the support the Malawi delegation will give them in all the deliberations at this Conference.

Allow me to heartily welcome the following new Members of the ILO: Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Oman and, indeed, South Africa; and in a very special way, to extend most sincere congratulations to South Africa for their successfully concluded democratic elections that have given birth to a new multiracial and democratic Republic of South Africa.

May I now turn to the reports placed at the disposal of this Conference that form the basis of our discussions. With reference to the Report of the Director-General, Defending values and promoting change, my delegation considers the Report to be a timely outcome of great thought in seeking solutions to labour problems in the context of overall international development issues. Given the mandate of the ILO, to advance world peace by promoting social justice, this is a welcome move that deserves the support of the member States of the ILO and its constituents. The world economy is becoming both internationalized and interdependent. There is thus a need for the ILO to adapt to these changes in order for this world body to be more responsive to the needs of its Members.

The Director-General has ably brought to our attention the major changes which have taken place in the world since the ILO was founded in 1919 and the Declaration of Philadelphia was adopted at the end of the Second World War. The world division between East and West and thereafter North and South created a dual tension until recent years; however, this has been somewhat relieved with the demise of Communism and the globalization of the world economy. This has inspired a new hope for a better future but for a country like Malawi, it is the widening inequality in development between the developed and underdeveloped countries that is of paramount concern.

We observe that indeed the market economy and democracy are gaining ground; the globalization of the economy is increasingly expanding with the gradual liberalization of national economies; and there is a growing integration of financial markets and a massive flow of capital between countries. Despite all these developments, there are many countries today whose citizens are still subjects of poverty, suffering from the double scourge of unemployment and underemployment. The Director-General, has in his Report, rightly made reference to this observation.

The problems of poverty and employment creation in sub-Saharan Africa are worsening as this subregion is increasingly being marginalized in the world economy.

Certainly, it is a paradox that Africa should be grappling with poverty and underemployment in Africa at a time when the rest of the world is looking into the future with some hope. National governments in Africa could benefit from integration of their national economies into a global system if the benefits from international trade resulted in the development of the entire nation. This does not seem to be the case at the moment. The terms of trade are not favourable to the trading partners in the African region to allow the countries in this subregion to develop, attract further investments and therefore generate jobs.

Malawi puts an overriding priority on providing productive and freely chosen employment to the country's increasing labour force, as a major source of income. Malawi's social objectives of combating poverty and unemployment will not be realized as long as the gains from international trade are still minimal. Since the country's independence in 1964, Malawi has adopted an outward looking development policy centred on agriculture. Malawi's economy, therefore, is still vulnerable to international policies that have direct effect on the already limited national policy options for development.

There is, indeed, a direct link between international trade and social progress within a nation. It is here that the question of consideration of international labour standards for fair trade practices becomes relevant. International trade can spur economic development – and in the process social progress – if it results in increased investment, generation of more jobs, higher incomes and the general improvement in the quality of lives of the working population.

My delegation observes that although liberalization of international trade and capital movements provide the possibilities for economic growth, employment creation and poverty alleviation, they are, however, no guarantee for social progress to be realised for the majority of the working population in Africa as things now stand. Malawi would thus support the view for the international community, as it is being advanced in the Report of the Director-General, to critically examine the relationships between the role of international labour standards in promoting social justice and international trade for economic development. There are indeed benefits that may accrue from increased and continuing liberalization of international trade, but there is still need for ensuring that the gains made are equitably shared with the workers.

The ILO has a constitutional mandate to promote social progress within member States and thus contribute to world peace. Given its expertise, long experience in the formulation and supervision of the application of international labour standards, and unique tripartite composition of membership, the ILO is the best placed United Nations agency to enter ably into social dialogue with other organizations concerned with finance, economic and trade issues – as long as they have a bearing on employment generation and the attainment of higher standards of living. ILO efforts should be supportive of international trade practices that lead to sustained development and a general rise in the standard of living of the people. The ILO would indeed cease to be a major source for promoting social justice through social and economic policies adopted and implemented by member States, if its influence did not extend to international policies. This is because factors that have a direct bearing on social progress are no longer wholly controlled by national governments.

Malawi continues to be a beneficiary of the ILO's technical assistance through its regional projects such as the African Regional Labour Administration Centres (ARLAC) and the Southern African Multidisciplinary Advisory Team (SAMAT) that need to be fully supported by the ILO. We very much welcome the active partnership policy adopted by the ILO so that it might better respond to the needs of its Members in technical cooperation. Malawi particularly requires the ILO's technical and financial assistance in the area of employment generation, as it has an increasing labour force; this is truer now than ever, as the multiparty democratic State guarantees basic human rights as embodied in the country's Constitution such as the respect of freedom of association and promotion of the collective bargaining process. It is for this reason that the new Malawi Government, which is barely a month old, has actively begun a study of the international labour Conventions and Recommendations with a view to ratifying or adopting them.

Malawi thus values greatly technical and financial assistance from the ILO in the human resources sector; and it is my sincere hope that under the new political order this will continue and increase in order to nurture and strengthen the still fragile democracy.

Malawi will need ILO assistance in the areas of employment promotion such as entrepreneurship development, vocational rehabilitation and industrial training, considering the country's increasing labour force in search for jobs. Technical assistance will also be required to strengthen the principle of tripartism in the country, in particular freedom of association, collective bargaining and the labour administration. The social security system also needs to be established – and for this purpose studies have to be carried out together with the training of staff. And for an environmentally sound and sustainable development, continued assistance in the areas of occupational health and safety is also a necessity.

As in the past, we hope to receive an even more positive response from the ILO regarding our requests for technical and financial assistance in order to address the development needs of the nation.

For this reason, my Government has taken a keen interest in the technical cooperation programmes of the ILO and we are looking forward to developing more active cooperation with this Organization in the fields of labour, employment and development.

Mr. MOORE (Minister of Labour, Human Resources and Training, Bahamas) – Firstly, on behalf of the Bahamas delegation, I wish to congratulate the President on his election to the Presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. It is most fitting that a Workers' delegate is chosen as President of this Conference, as we celebrate 75 years of the existence of an Organization which has contributed so much to improving the lives of working people in all countries of the world. I also add my congratulations to the Vice-Presidents on their election.

Again, on behalf of the Bahamas delegation, I wish to extend our warmest congratulations to this august body on the occasion of its 75th anniversary. Over the years, the International Labour Organization, through its tripartite composition, has contributed significantly to a greater awareness and understanding of the need to foster and maintain industrial harmony in member States. The Bahamas would wish on this special occasion to reaffirm its commitment to the beliefs and principles on which the ILO was founded.

Anniversaries provide an excellent opportunity for assessment and evaluation; an opportunity to reflect on how far the Organization has come and the distance yet to be travelled.

It is no mere coincidence that the important highlights of the ILO's history parallel periods of great social upheaval.

The ILO was founded after the First World War, and was in one sense a response by a war-weary world to a deep-seated longing for permanent world peace. It was hoped that the institutions founded after the war would help to maintain the newly established peace, and ensure that never again would mankind engage in such mass destruction.

The embodiment of this longing is, I believe, summed up in one of the principles of the ILO – that universal and lasting peace can only be established on the basis of social justice, and social justice can only be achieved when workers are all free, working in their freely chosen professions and occupations and adequately rewarded with wages freely negotiated by collective bargaining.

The social upheaval caused by the Second World War, which ended 50 years ago, provided the ILO with an opportunity to review its principles and beliefs, and to decide whether the failure of the world to remain at peace was a reason to change in a fundamental way the principles, beliefs and structures on which it was founded.

This review took place at the 1944 Session of the Conference in the city of Philadelphia. The resulting Declaration was a ringing reaffirmation of the founding principles of the ILO and proclaimed the belief that greater activism on the part of the ILO was necessary to bring about the social justice which was and still is a necessary precondition for world peace.

The end of the Cold War and the apparent triumph of free economics and free trade have produced yet another period of social upheaval. One of the disturbing features of the current social upheaval is the loss of faith by the peoples of the world in the ability of their governments and institutions to achieve social justice and usher in a period of world peace and prosperity.

Occurring as it does, as the ILO celebrates 75 years of existence, an opportunity is presented to the Organization to review again its principles and chart new courses for a world that has seemingly lost its sense of direction and purpose.

I believe that when the review is completed, the ILO will once again reaffirm its belief that only when all men are free – free from oppression, poverty, unemployment, political dictatorships and racism – will the world experience the kind of world peace that the founding fathers envisaged 75 years ago, when this Organization was established, and a peace which the oppressed people of the world so fervently wish for today.

Some organizations grow old without growing up and others have a tendency to outlive their usefulness. Fortunately, the ILO does not fit into either category. The need for the ILO is as relevant today as it was 75 years ago and credit must be given to the leadership of this Organization for recognizing the need to adjust to the changing times while at the same time seeking to adhere to its original principles.

As the ILO moves towards its centennial, there is consequently a need for Members to strengthen their relationships with the Organization, because the changing social and economic conditions have brought to the forefront new social and economic problems. There is now more than ever a greater need for the services which the ILO provides, particularly in the area of technical cooperation. The Bahamas is pleased to note that steps are being taken by the ILO to strengthen its research capabilities in order to provide and publish analyses of current social issues of particular concern to member States. Such information would greatly assist policy-makers and social partners as they seek to grapple with the social and economic reforms.

The consideration being given to the establishment of a forum for debate is an excellent idea. Meetings with a technical theme and with appropriate experts to discuss areas such as employment, training, privatization, etc. would provide an opportunity to exchange ideas and share experiences which should prove useful to participants.

The Bahamas supports the playing of a greater role on the international scene by the ILO. Due to the nature of its mandate and its experience over the years, the ILO is strategically placed to exercise great influence on the deliberation and policy decisions of those institutions which play important roles in the management of the world economy. The involvement should not be done at the expense of its constituents but rather should ensure that labour-related issues and concerns are taken into account at the highest international level.

In order to allow for full debate on major problems facing the world economy, we support the biennial conference of the Governing Body, which would discuss at its meetings the employment situation and the trends in the world economy which affect employment in member States.

The ILO's past is our heritage. The ILO, as it is at present, is our responsibility. The ILO's future is our greatest challenge.

Let us all resolve to successfully meet the challenge and create an era of world peace and prosperity, based on social justice.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

Thirteenth sitting

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT – We shall now continue our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On behalf of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan and myself, I feel it a great privilege and honour to offer my sincere congratulations to the President on his on well-deserved, unanimous election to the presidency of this historic session of the Conference, in which he is representing the international workers' group as well as the working class of his own great country, the United States of America. I also take the opportunity to convey congratulations to the Vice-Presidents including my old friend, Brother Mendoza, representing the workers' group, and to convey fraternal greetings on behalf of the workers' group of Pakistan to all the distinguished members and participants of this Conference.

We welcome the membership of South Africa as an independent nation and salute the independence achieved by the heroic struggles of the people of South Africa under the able leadership of President Mandela. The people of Pakistan were represented at the historic oath-taking ceremony in Johannesburg by our Prime Minister who reflected our country's good wishes for the people of South Africa in their new journey of independence with success.

It also gives me pleasure to convey our appreciation of the good work done over the past year by the Governing Body of the ILO under the chairmanship of Mr. Nkomo, and by the Workers' group chaired ably by Brother Brett, assisted by Brother Ryder, secretary of the group.

May I also take the opportunity to convey our deep appreciation of the dedicated work of Brother Laurijssen, who for a number of years was secretary of the Workers' group, in this great Organization.

On the eve of the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the foundation of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, Mr. Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, has rightly chosen an important subject for his Report, namely Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda. The founding fathers of the ILO rightly proclaimed that universal and lasting peace can be established only if they are based on social justice. This means eliminating injustice and widespread hardship and privation by improving people's living and working conditions and by duly respecting the principle of freedom of association. This is why the Director-General has stressed the need to eliminate social injustice in the world of work by: promoting better working conditions; combating all forms of exploitation of working people, respecting the dignity of working men and women by recognizing the right of freedom of association and expression and developing a social dialogue to strengthen the institutional framework of tripartism; and ensuring every person the opportunity of employment, and eliminating poverty which is endemic to our planet.

We fully support the promotion and strengthening of these objectives. However, it is painful to find that, despite the great technological revolution achieved by mankind and the ending of the bipolar world and the Cold War, social and labour problems have been developing and the deep-seated inequalities between States and between people have been growing even wider. We are still confronted with a world wherein: 1.2 billion people (or one-fifth of the world's population) are living in conditions of extreme poverty; the child workforce is estimated between 100 and 200 million and is subjected to inhuman conditions of exploitation; and women are grossly discriminated against. Some 700 million people are unemployed or underemployed in this world.

The Director-General has further pointed out that our hopes of reducing inequalities between States and within States have been fully and cruelly disappointed: between 1960 and 1989, the countries with the richest 20 per cent of world population increased their share of global GNP from 70.2 per cent to 82.7 per cent, while their counterpart poorest saw their share fall from 2.3 per cent to 1.4 per cent. The consequences for income inequalities already existed in 1960, and the top 20 per cent received 30 times more than the bottom 20 per cent; however, in 1989 they were receiving 60 times more. In order to tackle this serious problem, it is necessary to reiterate our confidence in the proclamation of the Declaration of Philadelphia that "Labour is not a commodity" and that "Poverty anywhere constitutes danger to prosperity everywhere". Mankind is like a garden – we are the flowers in it. It is like a tree – we are the fruits on it. Our present and future is interdependent on this planet, and therefore it requires international and national action to promote the values of social justice.

At the international level, the net resources of the developing countries should be consolidated by easing foreign debt liabilities. For example, 60 per cent of Africa's export earnings and 33 per cent of those of Latin America are paid in foreign debt service servicing; ensuring a fair price of their products; transferring technology to promote people's economic and social well-being rather than to develop war machines; ensuring respect of human dignity and implementation of workers' rights; guaranteeing the social dimension to safeguard workers' rights when imposing International Monetary Fund and World Bank structural adjustment programmes.

Nationally, we need the political will to grapple with the economic and social crisis facing Third World country populations by: developing human resources and providing meaningful education and training to all children irrespective of the status of their parents – people are a country's principal assets, their well-being defines development, a healthy well-educated citizenry contributes to the social well-being of a country and imparts dynamism to all aspects of life and culture; enforcing austerity in all walks of life and reducing irrational widening of the inequalities between the various classes; abolishing the evil of feudalism and providing landless peasants access to land resources and know-how; promoting the values of dignity of work instead of attaching dignity upon wealth, in order to encourage the respect of work and contribute to society and mankind as a whole; combating poverty by providing for basic needs such as productive employment, safe drinking water, electricity, communications, health, education, housing for the less-privileged class – in particular rural populations – and raising the income-generating capacities of rural women thus helping to check rising urban migration; improving working and living conditions of workers, including those working in the informal sector; respecting workers' trade union and collective bargaining rights, ensuring equality of treatment and combating child labour abuse and discrimination against women, in conformity with ILO standards; acquiring technology to improve the working and living conditions of working men and women; imbuing industrial relations with team spirit, and strengthening the institution of tripartism by promoting and strengthening the representatives of workers' and employers' organizations for the welfare of the workers, raising productivity and developing harmonious industrial relations; enlarging the vocational training, education and retraining programmes through tripartite consultations to meet technological development; adequately promoting social safety nets for workers, and carrying out structural adjustment through dialogue in order to provide safeguards against unemployment; practising good governance by respecting the norms of integrity and dedication to the public welfare and by inspiring examples of high character of public representatives for youth.

The ILO has before it both the opportunity and challenge of helping governments and workers' and employers' organizations in accomplishing these tasks by: strengthening worker and vocational education programmes; implementing measures to promote human rights through its universal and indivisible human rights labour standards; raising its technical cooperation programme in employment, human resources development, migration, the International Institute for Labour Studies, and education and training at the Turin Centre; improving working conditions and promoting equality; improving the environment; combating the abuse of child labour; and promoting its international labour standards.

We appreciate the work of the ILO in the fields of: workers' education; vocational training; health and safety; combating child labour; migration; employment; the uplift of rural labour, including women workers; the International Labour Institute, the Turin Centre, the Workers' Relations Branch, as well as the work of the ILO Offices in Islamabad and Bangkok.

We assure the ILO of our continuing support in the execution of its mandate. This is why, in Pakistan, we have celebrated the 75th anniversary at a tripartite level with great fervour. We organized a variety of events and had the pleasure, at one of them organized by the Government of Pakistan, of welcoming the participation of Mr. Nakumara, Assistant Director-General, responsible for the ILO activities in Asia and the Pacific; in addition, the trade union organized rallies and symposia to celebrate this event.

On this occasion, the trade union movement urged the Government of Pakistan to demonstrate its commitment to ILO objectives by ratifying the ILO Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), as well as the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), which we hope will be ratified.

In October 1993, general elections were held for our national parliament and provincial legislative, and Mrs. Bhutto was elected Prime Minister.

The Government of Pakistan has set up a tripartite labour task force to formulate recommendations on new labour policy.

The working class has suffered high inflation and high unemployment. The Government has been urged to take radical measures to solve these issues in order to mitigate the sufferings of downtrodden people; for this reason, the working classes have been pressing for negotiations on a priority basis.

On this historic occasion, we urge member States to come forward and demonstrate their commitment to this Organization by ratifying ILO Conventions laying down basic human and trade union rights. Pakistan has ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). We are urging the Government to ratify others.

We hope that the deliberations of this Conference will go a long way to bringing about a better tomorrow for working men and women all over the world and promoting social justice.

Original Spanish: Mr. CASTILLO (Employers' delegate, Dominican Republic) – The employers' sector of the Dominican Republic would like to say what an honour and pleasure it is to be participating in this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, whose agenda contains issues which are important for the future of labour relations, the promotion of employment and world development.

This coincides, most appropriately, with the 75th anniversary of the Organization. In those 75 years the ILO has, at its different phases, achieved human well-being and social justice and I should like to congratulate all those who have made the achievement of this valuable and successful mission possible.

We share the Director-General's optimism in his Report. He presents a series of relevant ideas so that the ILO can adapt its structures to the new economic, social and political realities of today's world.

These changes are founded on a world policy of detente with the virtual end of the Cold War and the reaffirmation of democracy, trust in private enterprise as the engine for development, the strengthening of the market economy and the related gradual liberalization of national economies, together with impressive technological changes which have had a decisive impact on the allocation of resources, particularly as regards the need for improved formation of production factors.

The Employers of the Dominican Republic reaffirm their concurrence with tripartism as the essential pillar of the ILO and the best possible instrument for social dialogue. This is the setting in which the ILO's recent activities are best placed in order to harmonize productivity, competitiveness, employment, social equity and justice, in a context of irreversible globalization and the creation of a network of new world relations.

It was with tripartism in mind that the social actors in the Dominican Republic agreed, in 1992, on a new Labour Code and last year they approved its implementing regulations. Both of these legal instruments and their extensively modernizing features could undergo certain changes in the near future in order to align them with the globalization of the economy, and to make their interpretation and implementation respond effectively to the dynamism of the labour market and the need to create productive employment.

We have had a number of problems in applying the Code which have to do with courts under whose jurisdiction it comes. This is due in part to the faulty interpretation of the text due by certain members of the courts, and to a lack of proper training in jurisprudence and doctrine. To overcome these difficulties we are working hard with the other social partners in order to provide the proper training for these members.

Our society is facing a great challenge: to join in the new world economy, which calls for high productivity, where there is fierce competitiveness, and which requires efficiency in factors of production, a good deal of innovation and adjustments in the labour markets. The trick is to respond to these challenges by permanently creating new jobs and seeking new forms of integrating the informal sector into our society.

In this context the tripartism and technical cooperation of the ILO provide ample room for action and it is to be hoped that its eventual programmes and structures will adopt appropriate action so that we can modernize our social policies and that this will also provide us with the proper means for the transfer of technology and information that the globalization of our economies requires.

In the quest for greater social equity the Dominican Republic since mid-1993 has held a series of tripartite meetings in order to set up a broad and modern system of social security and thus preserve the social fabric of the nation. In this area the main principles of the ILO are being scrupulously respected and we have incorporated highly significant concepts based on free elections, administrative effectiveness, universal coverage, solidarity, equity, competitiveness and flexibility in the supplier and user markets.

Giving priority to poverty is essential. We therefore agree with what was said by the Presidents of the Ibero-American Enterprise Organizations at their meeting in Cartagena, Colombia, on 18-20 May of this year. They took a realistic look at the problem of poverty and income distribution. Employers recommended profound changes in social policies in order to guarantee sustained and sustainable growth of our economies.

Because of its relevance and wisdom, we concur with the stance taken by the International Employers' Organization with regard to ILO standards. We hope that this august Conference will view this position favourably when it studies and decides on the modernization of its structures and procedures. We see the reality of the statement by the Director-General who in his Report states: "It is truer today than ever before that the existence of a body of labour legislation is not enough unless every person has the opportunity to find employment".

Lastly, the process of globalization of our economies is evident to all, particularly since the GATT Uruguay Round agreements. Consequently, changes in our economic trade and labour legislation will have to speed up. So as to reduce any traumas to a minimum, the ILO and other agencies in the United Nations system must provide technical assistance to developing countries in order to guarantee world peace, human rights, democratic processes, equity and justice to all those of us who have the enormous privilege of sharing the resources of the Earth.

Mr. MENDOZA (Workers' delegate, Philippines) – Allow me to express on behalf of the Workers' delegation of my country our sincerest congratulations on the election of Mr. Gray to the highest post of this Conference, and on the election of the other Vice-Presidents. I would like to express my profound gratitude to all delegates for electing me as one of the Vice-Presidents.

Let me extend our warmest greetings to the International Labour Organization on the occasion of its 75th anniversary. We commend the ILO for the significant role it has played in the promotion of development and social justice worldwide. The Philippine trade union movement in particular is very grateful for the fruitful relations it has had with the ILO over the years. Our progress in our work to promote the welfare of Filipino workers would not have been possible without the active partnership of the ILO.

Allow me also to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO on his excellent Report to the Conference. We believe that the chosen focus of his Report, the future role of the ILO, brings into proper perspective the important role the ILO will assume in the midst of rapid international economic and social changes. The Philippine trade union movement supports the Director-General in his call for the ILO to adopt labour standard-setting activities in line with the needs of its member States.

It is in light of this call by the Director-General to adopt labour standard-setting activities that I take this occasion to address a very important issue which will be the focus of extensive debates within and outside the ILO in the near future.

I refer to the inclusion of the social clause in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and the adoption of mechanisms to implement the social clause.

In support of the position taken by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the Philippine trade union movement has taken the position that universally recognized conventions on trade union and human rights must be directly linked to the international trade agreements.

We do not subscribe to the idea that principles in ILO Conventions and Recommendations vary in interpretations in different countries. It is only in their applications that these Conventions may vary to conform with each country's peculiarities in their industrial relations systems.

The premise of this belief is in the fundamental principles contained in the Declaration of Philadelphia, namely that labour is not a commodity; freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustained progress; and poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere.

As a developing country, we do not aspire yet to wages and working conditions comparable to those in developed countries. We recognise and fully appreciate the arguments of those in other developing countries, that a rigid application of the standards of developed countries would constitute non-tariff protectionist barriers against the developing countries.

What the Philippine trade union movement is particularly concerned about is the fact that our social justice gains, achieved after decades of arduous struggle by the free and democratic trade unions, will be diluted by forces outside and within our borders under the guise of competition for export markets.

We cannot and should not allow forces with the barest regard for trade unions and social justice to dominate economic competition. To do so would compel us to disregard the ILO's achievements over the past 75 years in promoting development and social justice.

As we begin to tear down tariff barriers worldwide, and as we embark on the full and genuine liberalization of global trade, free and democratic trade unions such as those in the Philippines seek the ILO's support in the adoption of a social clause in trading agreements, especially in the framework of the GATT and its proposed replacement, the World Trade Organization.

The social clause should in particular contain the minimum basic rights enunciated in ILO Conventions such as those concerning freedom of association, the right to organize and bargain collectively, equal remuneration, non-discrimination, abolition of forced labour, and the minimum age for employment or child labour.

These are Conventions which were adopted by the ILO after years of debate and lengthy deliberations.

The adoption of the social clause would in fact enhance free trade, as competition would no longer be a function of the level of trade union repression and disregard for basic trade union and human rights.

In closing, allow me to also express the support of the Philippine trade union movement for the formation and operationalization of Joint Advisory Committees whose task shall be to examine the social dimension of trading arrangements.

The Joint Advisory Committees, which shall include representatives from developing countries, would be more appropriate than current unilateral mechanisms which are greatly influenced, and understandably so, by overriding national interest.

Original French: Mr. RAKOTOVOLOLONA (Minister of Public Service, Labour and Social Law, Madagascar) – It is a great honour for me to greet this Assembly on behalf of the delegation of Madagascar and in particular to congratulate the ILO, the President of the Conference and the Director-General on the 75th anniversary of the Organization.

There is no need for an analytical review of the efforts that the ILO has deployed to give a more human face to the world of work throughout that period.

Its many resolutions and publications and the wide range of activities it has undertaken throughout the world are proof of its determination to promote a universal Code of Conduct and a modern approach to the organization of work consistent with each country's separate identity.

The difficulties encountered have to be seen in the context of the range of tasks that the ILO has set itself.

As others have noted, the geopolitical situation consisting of a twofold division of the world into two ideological and economic systems, East and West, North and South, rich countries and poor countries, have checked the momentum that the ILO has always wanted to impart to its standard-setting activities.

Defending values, promoting change, more balanced social justice – these are the key ideas that should accompany the globalization of the economy.

In a rapidly changing world, in which the triumph of democracy and the market economy determine the evolution of human relations, it is obvious that encouragement, support and international solidarity for greater social justice are a shared responsibility.

Caution and vigilance must be exercised in interpreting and implementing the conclusions of the recent international negotiations. Madagascar is open to all forms of dialogue aimed at achieving a global consensus in the interests of all.

However, Madagascar is adamant that social clauses should not be allowed to mask the growth problems of the developing countries.

The forging of a comprehensive vision of social justice is a constant dimension of the economic recovery policy of the Third Republic of Madagascar. The idea of involving all parties in economic and social recovery in the framework of tripartism implies that the microcosm of the world of work is homogeneous in each country. Unfortunately this is by no means the case inasmuch as action taken with regard to the education and training of workers in particular has hitherto been confined, for the most part, to workers in the private sector.

The ILO's assistance in the context of democracy and the market economy must therefore increasingly benefit public-sector employees so that the microcosm of the world of work is made viable and sustainable.

Madagascar considers that a country's social and economic recovery policies must always make provision for balanced personality development and the defence of human dignity as the sole basis of unity of action.

Promoting change is an idea that arouses both hope and anxiety. The desired course of events calls for universal participation and responsibility. In a developing country, the process of development will be long and hard, and deserves close attention on the part of international organizations. All assistance provided during the critical phase of major change towards democracy and a market economy must be based on a strictly objective understanding of the circumstances.

This aspect of international cooperation may be viewed as a factor that accelerates momentum towards the globalization of the economy and the gradual disappearance of divisions between rich and poor countries.

I hope that the tenor of my statement, which is intended as a message, will be heard and transmitted so that the idea of implementing social adjustment as a factor conducive to well-being and peace prevails.

Original Hungarian: Mr. SZÜCS (Employers' delegate, Hungary) – On behalf of the Hungarian employers, may I greet with great respect all the participants of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

It is a great honour for me to represent the Hungarian employers at a session which coincides with the 75th anniversary of the establishment of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. In Hungary today, the highest forum on all issues related to the world of labour is the Council of Reconciliation operating in a tripartite system. This body is competent in respect of the minimum wage, the Labour Code, and all related matters.

The Council of Reconciliation sends delegates and experts to Sessions of the International Labour Conference. This Council has entrusted me with the task of being the head of the Hungarian delegation, as the Chairman of the National Federation of Industrial Associations.

Just before this Conference, parliamentary elections took place in Hungary. The new Government is expected to be formed within a few days.

As a result of the changes in the Government, we hope that the dialogue between the Government and its social partners, including the representatives of the economic world, will become more active. As part of those changes, we expect economic social agreements to be concluded between the Government, the trade unions and the employers' organizations. Those agreements may include the following key elements.

First, let us speak about the economy. A primary task is to agree on the measures necessary to launch economic growth. A basic principle is that we should make a halt in the consumption of capital in the entrepreneurial sphere; the revenue retained in the economy should increase in real value and, concurrently, social sensitivity should increase. This can only be achieved if the expenses of the central budget and consumers' real income decrease in real value during the next two to three years. To improve social sensitivity, part of the income thus regrouped should be distributed exclusively among the needy. This requires: first, a favourable money market and credit policy, priority to make money available to the real business sphere, and elimination of existing discriminations; second, a long-term simplified system of regulation, especially the modernization of the system of taxes and levies, including: the encouragement of investment in enterprises, investment projects and the establishment of workplaces; a reduction in the redistribution role of the State; an appropriate subsidy system; a cut in the huge central budget expenditure; financing of the growth of state debt; and privatization.

Let us now turn to the social sphere. In this respect the following are important: basic principles of social policy; a revision of the social elements of the budget, such as health insurance, pension insurance, etc.; methods to manage the tensions of transition; employment policy; issues related to the Labour Code; issues related to wages such as the minimum wage and suggested wage increases; and permission to recognize some of the remunerations paid to employees as costs.

According to the view of the employers, economic aspects must be given priority when concluding agreements. This view is based on the fact that labour aspects and social issues can only be negotiated when entrepreneurial positions are already known. To strengthen the position of entrepreneurs, the role and ownership position of the State should be further reduced and the conditions for economic growth should be established.

The employers believe that in the process of reaching an agreement at the level of society, the employers' and employees' representatives of the Council of Reconciliation must also be present along with the representatives of other organizations. As part of that process the Council of Reconciliation should deal also with the documents to be prepared by the new Government on the assessment of the situation and the government programme.

The Council of Reconciliation should be the exclusive forum to agree on macroeconomic matters. Similarly, the Council of Reconciliation should decide on basic labour issues such as the minimum wage, offered wages, employment policy and the Labour Code.

Alongside the conclusion of agreements, the tripartite system of reconciliation should be further developed in accordance with the conditions of the social market economy. The operation of the tripartite system should be supported by adequate legal guarantees. The reconciliation system could be successfully supported by a law on representation interests.

During recent years, legal regulations have been adopted concerning the world of labour and, today, we should speak about the updating of those regulations.

The questions of the Eastern and Central European region are still high on the agenda within the ILO and rightly so. Special programmes and recommendations are developed for the States of this region.

We believe that the various countries of this region should not be treated as if they were uniform. Economic and other conditions may vary considerably in these countries and, consequently, there may be differences in the regional and trade associations. These should be left to develop on the basis of the prevailing economic and social conditions. The region is usually qualified as a critical region. We believe that the situation is becoming less and less critical.

We would like to become increasingly involved in the work of the ILO. This is also indicated by the fact that the delegate of the Hungarian employers is a deputy alternate member of a Governing Body committee. We hope that eventually we will be able to recommend someone for ordinary member status.

What we would like to obtain is to enjoy similar conditions to those which make it possible for the Government to maintain international relations. Such conditions should be made available also for the employers and employees to establish cooperation with foreign fellow organizations, both in the East and the West.

We consider part-time employment as important and to be an integral part of employment policy. I am sure the experience obtained here can be successfully used at home.

In Hungary, at present, approximately 1 per cent of employees work part-time. In practice, employers do not hire part-time workers from the labour market but receive a state subsidy for not making their workers redundant; they therefore keep them as part-time workers. This area is not properly regulated yet in Hungary.

At present, the unemployment rate is about 12 per cent in Hungary. In view of this fact we believe it is timely to put on the agenda the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. Several measures have also been taken in Hungary to curb unemployment. Employment agencies may become important means in this campaign.

Finally, allow me to thank the ILO for allowing us to participate in the training seminar organized in Turin where we obtained much useful information. Thank you for the activities of the multidisciplinary team.

Original Russian: Mr. BADEI (Government delegate, Belarus) – The current session of the oldest international organization, celebrating its 75th anniversary, must distinguish itself in helping to align the ideals of the ILO with the need to strengthen social justice in the world of today and tomorrow.

The Government and people of the Republic of Belarus wish to pass on to our Organization and all the participants of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference their heartfelt congratulations and sincere wishes for continued success.

The Government and social partners of Belarus and are now organizing a whole series of events to commemorate this momentous occasion. These include two international conferences, and a series of events to familiarize the mass of the population of the Republic of Belarus with the activities of the ILO, its aims and ideals. We consider that such work will promote the strengthening of democracy in our Republic.

Permit me to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to responsible posts of office at this session of the Conference. I would like to express my conviction that their professionalism and diplomacy will make it possible for us to organize the work of the Conference and to identify and adopt valuable decisions.

Permit me also to express our appreciation and our gratitude to the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, and to all the staff members of the International Labour Office for their excellent preparation for the session. The questions which we have before us for discussion are topical and timely, not only for Belarus.

I should particularly like to stress the significance of the Report of the Director-General Defending values, promoting change. The Report provides a philosophical consideration of the problems of a changing world and of social justice in a global economy. We support the ideas on enhancing the role of labour standards, and coordinating the activity of international, including financial, organizations. We think that there is a particular need in this respect for countries which are establishing market relations.

Over the past three years dozens of representatives of various organizations have visited Belarus, but the majority of these visits come to nothing. A welcome exception in this regard is the work of the specialists of the International Labour Office. They stand out not only because of their expertise, but also because they are action-oriented, striving for tangible results. For this reason we are happy to note the increasing cooperation with the ILO and are trying and will continue to try to ensure that the valuable experience and knowledge of ILO specialists are assimilated in my Republic.

It is with great pleasure that I wish to inform the highest body of our Organization that in Belarus, with the help of consultants from the International Labour Office, we are putting the final touches to new labour legislation appropriate for a market economy. We have provided for state employment services, labour inspection, a migration service, and labour arbitration boards. Work is under way on the implementation of a number of projects, including the development of self-employment in rural areas, and the conversion of cantonments into, for example enterprise and employment zones.

We would like to express our appreciation to staff from the European Regional Office (Standards and Labour Relations Sector), the Training Department and the Enterprise and Cooperative Development Department for their assistance to our young country.

Nevertheless, I have to say that our needs in this kind of assistance are not being fully met. Unfortunately, so far, we have not felt the benefit of feedback from the multidisciplinary team in Budapest covering the countries of Central and Eastern Europe. In this context we support the idea of the Director-General expressed in the Report with respect to the need to modernize the work of the Organization and to strengthen its structures in the field.

In particular we consider it expedient, as we mentioned at last year's session of the Conference, to create a special ILO centre for the countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States.

We also support the intentions of the Director-General to ensure a "thorough review of the ILO's publications" as the basic way to transfer information and distribute ideas relating to the ILO. Indeed, we have to recognize that there are very few ILO publications in Russian and this makes access to ILO material difficult for many specialists in CIS countries where, at the present time, we have particular need of such materials.

The present socio-economic situation in Belarus and other countries of the former USSR is complex. We have not recovered from the fall in production. Between 1991 and 1993, national income fell by 22 per cent and by 38 per cent in the first quarter of this year. High rates of inflation continue. All of this has taken its toll on the standard of living of our people. Real incomes in 1993 alone fell by almost 40 per cent.

There are both domestic and external factors behind the crisis, including the collapse of economic links, the growth of protectionism on the part of trading partners, fewer raw materials and the need for structural adjustment. However, the main cause is the poor efficiency of production which was disguised by low cost raw materials and centralized distribution. The Government is taking measures to bring us out of this crisis, by means of structural adjustment, economic reform and by furthering integration with countries abroad, both near and far. At the same time, the Government is strictly applying the recently adopted Basic Law, the Constitution of the Republic of Belarus which enshrines the democratic structure of our State, social guidance and sovereignty.

I will not conceal the fact that the crisis situation is being made use of by certain parties who are against market reform. This is why the Republic urgently needs financial, material and technical support. In this context, I do not understand the reasons why a number of international organizations are reluctant to finance projects which have already been approved. We are sure that commonsense will prevail and that the international community will support my country.

The creation of productive, freely chosen employment is an essential consideration in the activity of the Government and Parliament of Belarus. The development and implementation of a rational policy here has been an extremely complex undertaking. In a situation marked by a severe drop in investment for the structural adjustment of existing production and the creation of new jobs, we have had to be extremely cautious with regard to dismissing workers.

As of the beginning of June this year, the official number of unemployed registered by the employment service stood at approximately 2 per cent of the active population. However, hidden unemployment due to enterprises ceasing to operate and enforced leave has reached critical proportions and might in the near future become official unemployment. Under such conditions, the main attention of employment services is focused on the creation of sufficient resources for material support to the unemployed, the organization of retraining, the development of self-employment and providing support for enterprise.

On the whole, we share and support the ideas and approaches expressed in the Report of the Director-General on solving the problems of employment and we are ready to cooperate fully in this sphere with all countries and international organizations.

We support the adoption of a draft Convention and Recommendation on part-time work and believe that their implementation will promote the principles of social justice.

In conclusion, permit me once again to congratulate the participants of the session of the Conference marking the 75th anniversary of our Organization and wish them every success in strengthening peace and ensuring prosperity for all the peoples of our world.

Mr. CHAROENPHAO (Workers' adviser, Thailand) – First of all, on behalf of the Thai workers, I would like to congratulate the President on his election to steer the deliberations of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference; a special occasion to commemorate the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The Report presented by the Director-General reflecting general global problems and situations is extremely valuable. Not only has he clearly identified problems, but he has challenged us to find concrete solutions to them.

In this era of globalization and information technology, various regions have been organized into such economic areas as the EU, EFTA, and NAFTA. The world is thus unavoidably moving toward a standardized platform of economic, social and political activities.

However, this fast movement has also resulted in an even broader transnational investment from the industrialized to the developing, socialist and Third World countries. Trade wars have become even more vigorous, with increasing exploitation against the host nations. The devastation of natural resources, cultural values and the environment are carried out without any protective measures. There is no education at all on occupational safety and health. Many national laws fail to provide for social justice and benefits of the majority at large.

Thailand is one of the developing countries confronted by such problems, which are accumulating day by day. However, it is impressive to see that all parties concerned have endeavoured to sort them out with practical solutions. One striking example is establishment of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare by the present democratic government on 23 September 1993. The first Minister of Labour, Mr. Paitoon Kaewtong, has addressed this Conference as the chief delegate from Thailand. This is certainly a historic event for Thailand which, incidentally, coincides with the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, respectively. The Thai Government has observed this significant occasion with celebration.

To further signify this very memorable occasion, I request that the Thai Government earnestly ratify at least one international labour Convention – the one that is meaningful and useful for Thai workers. This would serve as a gift to the workers and a good example for other countries.

The setting up of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare has contributed towards problem-solving and development in many areas. For example, it has resulted in: an amendment of maternity leave legislation to allow for 90 days leave with pay; a minimum wage adjustment of up to 132 bahts a day as of 1 April 1994; legislative amendments on child labour protection law – the terms of imprisonment and fines have been increased for violations, resulting in a substantial cut in child labour; and legislation on a state enterprise employees' union, which is expected to be enforced this year.

However, two more critical issues have negative repercussions on employees.

First, the enforcement of the Social Security Act on child and old-age benefits scheduled for implementation in 1996 has been postponed indefinitely. The Government has been advised by the IMF and the World Bank that such allowances will affect the operation of the fund. Workers in all workplaces are anxious to see this provision promptly enforced.

Second, we are concerned about occupational safety and health. Working hazards and occupational diseases caused by toxic substances have been increasing significantly – especially in electronic industries operated by leading Japanese and United States companies. Many workers have been infected and died without a clear symptomatic analysis. Research carried out by two medical teams has revealed conflicting conclusions. While the report of the first medical team has identified exposure to toxic substances as the cause of infection, the second team stated that those who were infected had AIDS. Workers are now very confused and feel insecure. Thus, I would like to request for an urgent investigation by ILO experts, hoping that the ILO specialized team will not yield to the influence and interests of those multinational companies.

I have observed that labour problems faced by Thailand are relevant to the situations reported by the Director-General. If attempts to solve them have not been carried out, I hope that those will be recorded in the report for the next Conference.

Finally, I would like to thank the President and all distinguished delegates for their kind attention to our problems. On behalf of the Thai workers, I promise to give him all our support and cooperation throughout this Conference, so that its work is crowned with success.

Original French: Mrs. SASSO MAZZUFFERI (Employers' delegate, Italy) – My warmest congratulations to the President on his election, and my best wishes for the most successful possible outcome of this Conference. I am sure it will be successful under our President's expert guidance.

It is difficult to consider the Director-General's Report this year as a mere report. It offers to us components of a strategy that focuses on the ILO as it is today and on the Organization's future prospects in a globalizing economy in which we are still facing multiple obstacles in our attempts to affirm and effectively implement social justice. No country is divorced from this context; it would be tendentious to affirm otherwise.

In this context, the ILO can play a key role in the search for greater harmony between the economic and social dimensions. In my opinion, its role is to work together with economic and financial organizations whose contribution to development in different countries could be greatly enhanced by a better knowledge of the ILO's practical activities and its social and legal skills; the resulting collaboration could promote even wider application of international labour standards, etc.

The Employers' group has studied in detail the proposals made for the future of our Organization. The document summing them up is known to you all, and I fully agree with its content.

I will, therefore, simply underline a few aspects which I feel to be of particular interest. I shall begin with standards. Many continue to be, especially nowadays, of great value and are still the highest and most prestigious expression of the ILO's achievements. However, not all the standards that have been adopted have the same impact in different countries; some have been overtaken by social change; others have been made obsolete by technological innovation and still others are applicable only in limited contexts. Increasingly, standards remain unratified; this is a source of concern which compels us to seek solutions.

The basic ILO standards and, in particular, freedom of association, forced labour, equality of treatment, child labour, employment policy, have formed the foundation for legislation in many countries in the world.

Their relevance, their priority and their modernity remain unquestioned. We now have to supervise that application by strengthening the mechanisms available to the Organization. Where governments have freely accepted and ratified these standards, their application must be rigorously checked without delay.

In this context, it will be necessary to study how a link between international trade and internationally recognized standards impacts on the liberalization of trade and competition. As far as the "social clause" is concerned, we are currently looking into its very many implications, and are not convinced of the desirability of mixing trade with social instruments. what we would plead for is an improvement in the ILO's standard-setting policy – any intermingling with the responsibilities of other organizations; in achieving this, use should be made of all available means, including technical cooperation.

When we go beyond what I would call the "hard core" of existing standards, the choices are those of revision and, if necessary, denunciation. This latter procedure must be made more accessible and practicable by reducing the time-limits and formalities.

The characteristics to be sought in future instruments, continue to be flexible and adaptable to the cultural, economic, political and structural circumstances in the ILO's member States; the criteria for action must take account of the factors which are in force while qualifying the methods of action: tripartism and universality.

The Director-General has used the term "soft law" to define the main lines of future action in areas which are less amenable to complex regulation that is difficult to apply, particularly in changing circumstances. Greater scope should be given to Recommendations as instruments independent of Conventions, as well as to resolutions and other authoritative and prestigious texts in specific areas where they could be applied less formally, and could prove necessary in solving acute and urgent problems. Codes, handbooks, directives are instruments that are regularly consulted by technicians, engineers and business managers. We have daily confirmation of their practical value.

With this in mind, we need to study how to rationalize our approach to drawing up the Conference agenda so as to generate innovative ideas on content and current methodology.

It is in this spirit of pragmatism, focusing on the ILO's stronger and more effective role in satisfying the real needs of its constituents, that I envisage "defending values" and "promoting change" in the future of our Organization.

However, it is primarily within the countries calling for greater aid and assistance that we will measure the ILO's ability to respond to needs and expectations, and to achieve its objectives through the use of all available means: legal instruments, sectoral activities, social policy approaches, technical cooperation. In this latter area, the Turin Centre has earned its reputation as a "centre of excellence" for top-level training, to the advantage of the United Nations system as a whole.

Our support for the Centre, and our commitment to its future development are, and will remain, constant.

Quite rightly, the Director-General's Report places at the very core of ILO action the search for solutions to the unemployment problem. Our Organization has already devised numerous activities to promote the spirit of enterprise, of small enterprises and self-employment, as it has too for the creation, in countries where it is necessary, of independent organizations of social partners, which, in conjunction with their governments, are able to carry out an effective employment policy.

The items on this year's Conference agenda also bear witness to this endeavour.

This year, two of the Conference's Committees are working on subjects of recognized importance and urgency for our economies, namely: part-time work and the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of the labour market. The results of this work will be decisive steps in a new direction along the path – which employers have so often asked for – of greater flexibility in the rigid framework governing industrial relations and the employment market. This is a framework which, in many countries, actually prevents the creation of new jobs.

The ILO, with its courageous proposals, has shown its determination to come to grips with the realities and the needs of many countries. It has also shown its vitality and its modernity at the very time when it invites us to celebrate with it its 75th anniversary.

Mr. LARSEN (International Confederation of Executive Staff) – On behalf of the International Confederation of Executive Staff, the CIC, I have pleasure in congratulating the President on his election to the chair of this 81st Session of the Conference. I also wish to compliment the Director-General on his Report, which both describes the present situation and directs us towards the future of the ILO.

In a changing world, institutions and organizations must adapt if they want to have any relevance, and it is our belief that there is an urgent need to look at the standards and practices of the ILO and to reassess some of its basic principles in order to make it even more effective and to preserve and promote the rights of all employees, including managerial staff throughout the world, since this is not being done at the present time.

The Report of the Director-General specifically addresses areas that are of particular interest to the International Confederation of Executive Staff. Recent developments in Europe within the framework of the social chapter of the Maastricht Treaty and social dialogue at the European level have recognized managerial staff as a social partner, and this group of employees is involved as such in the shaping of the future European labour market.

Furthermore, the European Parliament has in recent years adopted a resolution dealing with the situation of managerial staff in Europe. Politically, it asserts and draws attention to the important role played by managerial staff in enterprises and institutions. In line with that development and also addressing the question of tripartism, we fully support the notion that the ILO should keep an open policy towards all representative actors on the social and labour scene.

There may be grounds for inquiring whether it is time to redefine the notion and content of tripartism. At the same time we note with regret that even in developed countries such as Canada, which is a founding Member of the ILO, particularly in the Province of Quebec, thousands of employees, mainly managerial staff even at the first supervisory level, are deprived of protection within the framework of the Convention on Freedom of Association. Furthermore, they are denied the right to bargain collectively. We find that unacceptable and we urge that the matter be considered at the ILO level.

Tripartism is, as such, a sound principle, but in order to be effective and complete it should include all actors in the labour market, which is not the case at present.

Social policy, which is dealt with in the Report of the Director-General today, covers a much wider area than the needs of those in employment. In a world economy it is increasingly clear that the complex and changing relationship between economic and social policy requires us to take a broader view so that social rights are not abandoned for the sake of a free market economy.

It is too narrow to focus only on specific questions such as labour law, and the ILO will certainly also have an important role to play if we redefine it to include social standards and clauses functioning at world level.

We recommend to the ILO that with the globalization of the trade, it seek constructive cooperation in this area with organizations of employees at all levels. In that process, it should bear in mind the need to guarantee and ensure respect for individual rights. Social policy plays an important role both in defining these rights and responsibilities and also in protecting them.

In order to attain these goals, and this will be my closing remark, we need to involve all those who in a qualified way can contribute to the progress of the ILO and the International Confederation of Executive Staff is certainly aiming to do just that.

Original Danish: Mr. JENSSEN (representative, Nordic Council) – As a representative of the Nordic Council, which is the parliamentary body ensuring cooperation between the Parliaments and Governments of the Nordic countries, I wish to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report.

The Report demonstrates clearly that the current situation in many parts of the world has not diminished the role or the tasks of the ILO. Not only are many countries suffering from economic difficulties and rising unemployment, but they are also having problems living up to ILO's international labour standards.

Attention must be drawn to the fact that although the principle of equality of opportunity between men and women is widely accepted in most countries in the world, inequalities still persist. We are therefore pleased to read about the initiative by the ILO to identify a body of policies, strategies and other concrete measures to serve as the basis for future action by the Organization and its member States.

We highly appreciate other initiatives by the ILO to develop labour market policies that improve access to employment and incomes and create favourable conditions for economic growth with employment security. Such efforts are important to secure the position of all groups that have a weak position in the labour market.

The efforts to eliminate child labour and guarantee the protection of child workers are also highly appreciated in the Nordic countries. At the international level, the Nordic countries have traditionally been actively involved in promoting compliance with United Nations conventions in different parts of the world, especially concerning the rights of the child.

We also have followed with interest the ILO's action to improve working conditions. In particular, the establishment of a clear and demonstrable link between improved conditions of work and increased productivity can make it easier to implement various international labour standards in many parts of the world.

The Nordic Council consists of 87 members from the Nordic Parliaments elected by those Parliaments. The Council holds two sessions each year, in March and November.

Nordic cooperation has a long tradition in the area of labour market policy. Cooperation started primarily in connection with the founding of the ILO. The Nordic countries felt the need to coordinate their unions on labour market issues in connection with international cooperation and even more importantly to exchange experience with regard to national policies.

A decisive development in cooperation was the adoption of the Agreement on a Common Nordic Labour Market in 1954. Under this agreement nationals of the Nordic countries have for decades been able to seek and take up employment in another Nordic country.

The Nordic countries have also been cooperating closely for some time in the field of social policy. Under the Nordic Social Security Convention, nationals of one Nordic country residing in another Nordic country have, in all essentials, the same social rights as the citizens of the country concerned.

In November 1993, the Nordic Council adopted a recommendation concerning extended Nordic cooperation on "citizens' policy" or "citizens' rights". The purpose is to promote, within the European Economic Area and the European Union, a policy for citizens which reflects the interests of the Nordic countries. The concept "citizens' policy" is used in a broader context in the Nordic countries than in the European Union: it encompasses not only the social dimension, labour market issues and equality of opportunity but also social security, family policy, health care, working environment, migration policy, consumer affairs and other issues.

This year a new agreement between the Nordic countries on social assistance and social services will enter into force. In addition to the Nordic Social Security Convention and the social rights provided for in the European Economic Area Agreement, it contains special Nordic rules on social assistance and social services.

Perhaps the most important question facing society in Northern Europe is whether there exists a future for the "Nordic model" in fields like labour relations. Some may regard it as a good thing for the Nordic countries and even suggest it as a pattern worth introducing in other nations. Others may disagree. But in a world which is becoming more interrelated and interdependent, the Nordic countries attach equal importance to preserving their basic characteristics and trying to influence the development of international standards and orders. The ILO is therefore for the Nordic countries, now and in the future, a valuable instrument to further their interests.

In conclusion, I wish to express my gratitude for this opportunity both to present some Nordic views on a few of the items before the Conference and to give some information about our work in the Nordic Council.

I wish the ILO continued success in its important work.

Original Polish: Mr. WOJCIK (Workers' adviser, Poland) – On behalf of the Polish Workers' delegation, I would like to begin by congratulating my colleague and friend, Mr. Charles Gray, on his election to the chair of this august assembly. I myself regard it as a great privilege to have this opportunity to address the International Labour Conference on issues of vital importance for the whole world of labour.

I would like first of all to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his extremely courageous choice of the main theme for the present session. It is my deepest conviction that the Report of the Director-General on Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda deals with a fundamental problem of adjusting the International Labour Organization to present and prospective challenges threatening our universal mission – social justice.

I wish to disagree with the Director-General's view that since 1989 the market economy has become the universally accepted standard on the grounds that the experience of Poland and other ex-communist countries has rather reaffirmed that the new economic system has become a dehumanized form of capitalism aimed at profit-making. It, therefore, needs to be emphasized yet more strongly, in the spirit of searching for social justice, that implementation of adjustment policies requires the full participation of the social partners. NSZZ Solidarnosc is not an opponent of change and adjustment programmes, but we are against ignoring their social dimension and particularly against the unfair distribution of the burdens they impose. Aspects of the social dimension have already been reflected, although still to an insufficient degree, in the adjustment policies of the World Bank, the IMF and the European Union. We are pleased to associate ourselves with the statement of the United Nations Secretary-General to this assembly a few days ago to the effect that he appreciates the social dimension in national and international economic policies.

All these imperatives mean that the International Labour Organization needs to formulate concrete directives of an alternative and constructive nature to be followed by those international institutions in framing adjustment programmes. In addition, the ILO will have to work on yet another element – effective mechanisms for exerting influence on those institutions to make them integrate social aspects into their adjustment programmes. In this field, a number of myths have appeared which ought to be rebutted, such as those concerning the allegedly insurmountable tension that exists between increasing the number of jobs and providing a degree of protection for workers.

With a view to creating a new profile for the ILO, "Solidarnosc", which I represent here, would like to share its experience from its struggle with communism from which it learned that the system became bankrupt not because of economic failure but rather because of its moral bankruptcy which generated an inevitable economic crisis. That experience taught us that one cannot compromise on the primacy of ensuring respect for inherent and fundamental human rights. These rights can be respected solely under conditions of social, economic and political order, for which the family should be the firm foundation. The ILO should, therefore, significantly increase its emphasis on better protection of the family and on the slogan of the International Year of the Family declared by Pope John Paul II and the United Nations.

The new direction of ILO action should not therefore undermine the validity of universal human rights and labour standards or lead to less careful monitoring of compliance with those standards for the sake of allegedly higher economic considerations. Human dignity is inviolable, and labour is not solely a commodity, as pertinently emphasized in the Declaration of Philadelphia. But, above all, labour is a value, always ranking higher than capital or other purely economic determinants.

A comprehensive assessment of the transition in Poland allows us to identify several impediments that had rarely been foreseen. One of them is the emergence of an oligarchic system due to such factors as: the lack of free distribution of State property among all citizens; the conflict between the demands of the social market economy and the old legal system adjusted to a highly centralized State; the absence of political and legal solutions which would contribute to the demise of remnants of the pre-1989 totalitarian system; and disrespect for social agreements negotiated with trade unions aimed at building the social dimension of the State.

It should be stressed that during the transition a number of discernible symptoms have had a negative impact on workers and their families. This impact might have been alleviated and more equally shared if successive Governments had integrated the social dimension more effectively into economic reforms.

A very frustrating fact is the persistently high level of unemployment. Figures for April this year show that there are 2,889,600 officially registered unemployed persons (15.7 per cent), half of whom are deprived of unemployment benefits. The Government has made provision in the state budget for a further 200,000 unemployed persons, with the likelihood of a further increase. Regrettably, the Government still focuses on passive administration of unemployment rather than on active employment policies based on wider participation of the social partners at all levels. Not enough of the financial resources available to combat unemployment is spent on training, retraining and active employment promotion among women and young people.

A failure to implement real and comprehensive privatization has contributed to social dissatisfaction and a slower pace of reform. When actually implemented, privatization offers privileges and capital to a very narrow sector of society, particularly to the post-Communist élites and new businessmen operating in "black" and "grey" zones of the market economy. Trends towards concentration of national wealth accumulated by previous generations in the hands of an oligarchy must be opposed. Otherwise, social and political tensions and conflicts may arise.

In spite of the growth of GNP (2.3 per cent in 1992 and 4.5 per cent in 1993), real wages have decreased (5 per cent in 1993). The situation is much worse in the case of family incomes; indeed many families are approaching the threshold of poverty.

In 1992, only 8 per cent of the whole society enjoyed an increase in real income, while 80 per cent saw their living standards decline, a trend that persists with alarming implications.

Former and present Governments have neglected and failed to implement the agreement concluded with trade unions in 1993, whereby a certain relation between growth of GNP and real wages was established. Family costs of living grow faster than the inflation rate, largely owing to rising fuel prices. The Government's policy on energy prices, based on political dictate, has become one of the major inflation-generating factors. Social safety nets have not yet been introduced and the present system of social security is disorganized and inefficient. There are no guarantees of minimum social safety and equal access to different forms of social assistance is not respected. A serious obstacle to further reform is the underdevelopment of tripartism, the construction of which is deliberately impeded. The statement by the Minister of Labour in the course of this Labour Conference to the effect that in Poland a system of collective agreements has been established in conformity with ILO standards runs counter to the facts. Moreover, criteria of representativeness of trade unions and employers' organizations have not yet been established. Against this background, earlier collective agreements are repealed in the privatized sector, exacerbating the situation of workers. In such circumstances, we find the statement by the Polish Minister of Labour about the withdrawal of the Government from collective disputes during the transitional period extremely dangerous since the State has remained an employer in a substantial part of the economy.

It was likewise untrue for the Polish Minister of Labour to say that the Act on "the protection of workers' claims in the case of insolvency ..." is compatible with that contained in the Covenant for State Enterprise in the Process of Change. Neither does the Act in question meet the requirement laid down in the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173) and the Government is therefore unable to have it ratified.

We have on several occasions raised in the ILO the question of the seizure of NSZZ Solidarnosc property and assets under cover of a martial law imposed in 1981. It is with deep regret that we must repeat that to date our assets have not been restituted. The Polish Government continuously violates the conclusions of the 1984 Commission of Inquiry requiring the Government to arrange for the restitution of the assets of NSZZ Solidarnosc. All Polish Governments, including those after 1989, bear responsibility for failing to return property and assets which largely remain at the disposal of the OPZZ trade union.

This being the case and in the face of inefficient national legislation and its enforcement, NSZZ Solidarnosc has decided to resort to the procedure of representations under Article 24 of the ILO Constitution. We hope that the authority and wisdom of the ILO will help to resolve this problem.

(Mr. Ould Sidi takes the Chair.)

Original French: Mr. DENIS (representative of the World Confederation of Teachers) – The Director-General's Report to this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, this being the 75th anniversary session, has been received with great interest by the World Confederation of Teachers. Our Organization will be holding its Sixth Congress in Senegal in August: the theme is "Building the future: Teaching and teachers working for democracy, culture and development". The draft resolution which has been submitted to the Congress includes elements which could complement or highlight certain positions presented in the Report of the Director-General.

The defence of democracy is an ongoing concern. It is the only social project capable of attaining equitable structures in a political, social, cultural and economic sense. More than ever before, citizens of the world today feel that government intervention, dictatorships of any kind, and unilateral nationalism are oppressive and deprive people of a decent existence. The role of teaching and teachers is essential to bringing about democracy, to reinforcing and to promoting it. From this point of view, tripartism, the acceptance of which is not as universal as the Director-General seems to believe, seems to us one of the best means to ensure respect for workers' individual and collective rights, such as have been laid down in ILO standards.

Democracy is in danger, tripartism is being questioned, standards – Conventions and Recommendations – are either applied in a half-hearted and reluctant way, or are simply not known.

Teachers, as did the second Joint ILO Meeting on Conditions of Work for Teachers (held in Geneva from 20-28 November 1991), insist on the full recognition of democratic rights and trade union rights contained in the ILO Conventions for all teaching staff. As the crisis deepens, as the opportunities for employment diminish and as the standards of living fall, especially under the influence of structural adjustment programmes of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, these rights are under serious attack in practice, chiefly in the countries of the Third World where they have already been recognized, but also in industrialized countries and in countries of Central and Eastern Europe where new liberal policies restrict the right to concertation and negotiation.

For teachers and the educational system as a whole, the importance of the Recommendation on the status of teaching personnel adopted in 1966, even more so today, continues undoubtedly to be the guideline and source of inspiration of a future-oriented strategy. The Sixth Ordinary Session of the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee which will meet in July 1994 in Geneva has a very great significance with regard to assessment of the application of the Recommendation and the strategies which have been implemented through subregional seminars and case studies. A special resolution of the Congress of the World Confederation of Teachers will deal with the future of this Recommendation.

The first meeting of the Standing Technical Committee for Educational Personnel in October 1995 will examine, among others, subjects such as training, retraining and the upgrading of teachers' skills. We will give due importance to this problem as well as to the first meeting of this Standing Committee.

In the general framework of fundamental rights, it will be necessary and of the utmost importance to remember that child labour is still a topical issue. This scourge must be fought. Teachers are fully committed to this struggle.

Finally, it will be necessary to develop the teaching of fundamental rights, the values of tripartism, and negotiations in teaching establishments. In the latter instance the teaching staff are committed to providing this information and training, which is indispensable to the growth of democracy.

Man does not live by bread alone. The economy and nothing else is an obstacle to development. Despite two development decades proclaimed by the United Nations (the Decade of Cultural Development covering the period 1988-97), we regretfully note that so far none of the major objectives which the international community set itself have been reached. The social aspect of development has led to a social decline which hits the poorest of the poor.

Implementation of the structural adjustment programmes has to a large extent affected the weakest levels of society in developing countries. Particularly, the harsh cuts in public expenditure are a great blow to teaching, to teachers, to all public services, to public health, food programmes and social security. How can teachers ensure social and cultural development when the withdrawal of public aid to the education system leads to the loss of reference values for the very life of society? Development and progress must be based on the development of human beings.

Teachers are convinced that the globalization of our societies is not in contradiction to their local roots. On the contrary, this may provide further reinforcement. It is absolutely necessary to develop a strong awareness of the historical, social and cultural heritage of each nation and community.

In developing countries, teachers often face many forms of racism, tribalism, regional differences, inequality between sexes, prejudice and illiteracy. In the so-called industrialized countries, teachers have to deal with a multicultural situation and their approach must therefore be an intercultural one.

On the other hand, as defenders of democracy, teachers are also its first victims, the same as intellectuals: torture, arbitrary imprisonment, and threats are their daily fare.

These increased responsibilities and this unusual situation require and demand that teachers feel supported by society as a whole, as well as by the education system, including the environment outside a school which affects the entire teaching environment.

The World Confederation of Teachers calls upon all bodies of the United Nations concerned with development to concert their efforts in order for international standards to be respected and for all human resources to be fully employed for the benefit of democracy, development, peace and justice.

The World Confederation of Teachers is pleased to see that the Director-General's Report reflects the will to promote a dynamic image for the International Labour Organization. Seventy-five years is not the past, it represents the future. It is only the future we are interested in since it involves our children, our grandchildren and future generations.

Original French: Mr. MADI (Government delegate, Comoros) – The delegation of the Comoros wishes to present to this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, through me, its joy at being able to contribute to the work of this session.

Taking the floor for the first time formally, we should like to take advantage of this opportunity to echo all those who have warmly congratulated the President on his brilliant election to preside over this august assembly.

We would also like to congratulate the wise team that surrounds him; and I should like, on behalf of His Excellency Mr. Said Mohammed Johar, the President of the Federal Islamic Republic of Comoros, to extend our keenest and warmest congratulations to all the delegates present.

On electing the President to steer the deliberations of this session we have only done our duty, because our choice is certainly commensurate with our desire to see wisdom, serenity, devotion and constructive dialogue prevail throughout our assembly.

I am convinced, as is my delegation, that with the support of all his Officers, he will do exactly what we know him to be capable of – and I promise him that we in our delegation will support him fully throughout the proceedings.

As each year at this time, we are called upon to examine the Director-General's Report. We note with satisfaction the diversity and importance of the subjects dealt with by the Report and I am sure that what is said in the Report will guide us in our work. I should therefore like to express my delegation's deep appreciation for the quality of this document and to congratulate the Director-General, its author, and all his staff who participated in producing it.

This year we are commemorating the 75th anniversary of our Organization, the International Labour Organization. It is now three-quarters of a century since the representatives of workers, employers and governments met together for the first time to promote social progress – and this progress is still the basis for the progress of human development and progress.

The achievements and success noted in all the activities of our Organization are not trifling – and we should remember this. I would like to remind you that all member States have been able to count on support from the International Labour Organization and this has been a source of satisfaction and pride for all our countries.

My delegation would like to take this opportunity to express the hope that the International Labour Organization will continue to prosper and extend its cooperation so that its activities in this area increase in scope and become wider and become more and more integrated into national development plans, in accordance with the priorities established by governments.

Of course, our efforts to achieve social justice have been tireless and have been significant; but now more than ever before we must remember that much ground still remains to be covered.

In all countries of the globe there are still situations where we note deprivation and injustice; unemployment and poverty still reign with impunity and to date no country can consider itself to be sheltered from this scourge.

The Director-General has said quite rightly that the future is important for us because it requires us not just to continue, but to redouble our efforts to achieve social justice in the world today and in the world of tomorrow.

The 81st Session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a time when, as the Director-General's Report aptly points out, the world is in the throes of change. I am thinking, in particular, of the end of the bipolar world, the triumph of market economies and the globalization of the world economy.

My country, like other member States of this Organization, is following with great interest and attention these major changes which will, no doubt, play a decisive role in the way our future actions and structure take shape in the future; and even if these changes have repercussions, they will nevertheless be positive in many respects. In referring only to a few changes mentioned by the Director-General, it would seem that, henceforth, our discussions will focus only on the world of labour in order to come up with the best possible solutions to specific problems.

The effective supervision of the application of standards, of which we are more than proud, will be carried out by all member States of our Organization.

The International Labour Organization, which brings together all the nations of the world, will defend and better ensure the universal values that it has always defended resolutely.

We shall overcome the scepticism we have acquired over the years and, as the world changes, as there are upheavals, we shall be called upon to make an in-depth analysis of our Organization's raison d'être and its forms of action.

In this connection, my delegation would like to endorse the option chosen to mark the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization; i.e. turn deliberately to the future and to ponder the responsibilities to be assumed tomorrow.

I cannot let this opportunity pass by without mentioning an issue which is close to all our hearts at the moment; and that is democracy.

With the disappearance of the bipolar world, democracy is growing from strength to strength, and today all nations of the globe quite legitimately aspire to the freedoms of democracy.

These trends, I am sure, will lead to a consensus on the principles of democratic society upon which we shall build and on the universal values which the International Labour Organization has always defended.

On behalf of my Government and of my delegation I should also like to extend my warm congratulations to the Director-General for having chosen the theme of democracy and for having pointed out in his Report that our Organization must play a role in this area, knowing to what extent these new democracies are vulnerable.

It is incumbent upon our Organization to set itself the goal of establishing a true rule of law, capable of guaranteeing the fundamental rights of all human beings, and the rights of workers in particular.

Whether this aid is of a financial or any other nature, it is vital, because many countries still have young and vulnerable democracies, which are always under the threat of repercussions and consequences of structural adjustment programmes – either negotiated or imposed.

As far as my country is concerned, which has joined the democratic process and become involved in structural adjustment, we place great hopes in the ILO and are expecting to learn from the experience of our brother countries.

Mr. ENGELBERTS (representative, Public Services International) – Mr. Robert Reich, the US Secretary of Labor, was quoted by the Financial Times on 8 June as saying "The OECD jobs study is like a Rorschach ink blot, in which different people see different things". The same could apply to the Director-General's Report where he tries to be all things to all people, perhaps in an attempt to give satisfaction to workers and employers where their views are in fact in conflict. The section dealing with the critical question of the social clause displays lack of decision and leadership and the Director-General's real intentions need to be clarified. He often limits himself to suggestions about possible alternative courses of action, rather than making firm proposals.

The Director-General says that cooperation with other United Nations agencies has been a key element in the development of the ILO and its means of action. At the same time, he acknowledges that the ILO is far from being a major actor on the international scene, it exercises little influence on important international institutions, and that it will cease to be a force for social justice unless it can influence international policies. He acknowledges that the ILO has not been able to influence International Monetary Fund and World Bank policies much in the past, but has very few concrete ideas of how matters could be improved.

The proposals that follow from this diagnosis are restricted to promotion of ILO influence through reinforcement of its intellectual capacity, a new series of high-level meetings and more forceful presentation of its views. There are no more concrete proposals of how the ILO should work with, or on, other institutions. The importance of the opportunity offered by the World Summit for Social Development is underlined, but the Director-General's argument that there is no forum for social issues in the international system is apparent acceptance of the fact that the ILO is totally absent from the terrain it should occupy, and which it alone has been created to deal with.

As Public Services International, representing also the workers in the ILO, we very much regret this hiding behind the reinforcement of intellectual capacities and would have expected from him more leadership. We agree with the need for labour, employment and social affairs ministers to carry more weight within governments, but we also expect from the Director-General a more effective and quick response to labour matters. Did he really fight back when the World Bank started introducing labour codes in Africa? What does he do on improving public management in Central and Eastern Europe, leave it to the OECD? Can one member of staff in TRAVINT really cope with all the problems facing the public services around the world, given the fact that there are 500 million workers in that sector? When is he really going to implement the decisions that were reached in the last Joint Committee on the Public Service?

Public Services International fully supports the proposals made by the Workers' group in their document The ILO towards the 21st century. Given the limitations in time I will restrict myself to the major points.

The ILO's mandate to promote social justice and peace by protecting workers and promoting their rights and better working conditions, must be maintained. Yes, the ILO should adapt to rapidly changing conditions to better achieve its objectives. But the objectives stay the same. The ILO must reassert its value and reinforce tripartism. Priority should be given to assist trade unions in improving their capacity to be effective actors in all areas of economic and social policy. Conventions and Recommendations and the mechanisms for their supervision are the ILO's principal means of action. Any attempt to reduce their role and influence must be resisted. The soft law approach of the Director-General does not attract us at all. New ways must be found of applying standards more effectively, in particular: the setting of new standards must continue; the standards on freedom of association, discrimination and forced and child labour should be declared a World Charter of Workers' Rights with the ILO campaigning for their universal ratification and application; and a complaints mechanism like the Committee on Freedom of Association should be extended to cover all of the standards in the World Charter.

Yes, we in PSI firmly believe the time has now come for a social clause in trade and investment agreements. And let me say to those governments who are opposing a social clause what it is we are not calling for.

We are not calling for a social clause which would reduce the competitive advantage that developing countries have in lower wages. We are not calling for an international minimum wage. We are not calling for an artificial equalization of labour standards between rich and developing countries. What we are calling for is respect throughout the world for basic workers' rights, which give those workers in the Third World a fair chance to raise standards over time. We are calling for the respect for human rights which would mean that trade and investment gains do not stay restricted to a small élite in developing countries, but are spread throughout the population.

If the ASEAN governments, as the resolution mentions, are not opposed to the application of ILO labour standards, why do the majority not allow public service workers the same rights as other workers and keep prohibiting their freedom of association?

What is this argument about universal values being less than Asian values? The Economist, not particularly a worker-oriented magazine, said this in an editorial of 28 May on Asian values, and I quote: "They suspect that the real point of Asian values is to give Asian authoritarians who do not want to surrender power, or even entertain the possibility of a western-like alternation of parties in government, a respectable cloak for their personal ambitions".

Of course, this is not limited to Asia. I listened with great care to what the Minister for Labour from Kenya said on 8 June in the plenary. I was particularly interested in his remarks on freedom of association. A week before I had met him in Nairobi to protest against the renewed ban on the Kenya Civil Servants Union, which dates back to 1980. The ILO recommended to the Government of Kenya in 1985 to restore the union. Despite these recommendations, despite the election manifesto of the ruling party, despite a parliamentary motion adopted on 13 October 1993, despite government approval of Justice Cockar's report which recommended the immediate establishment of the union as announced on 28 April 1994, the union was banned again on 11 May. Why? Perhaps we should ask the World Bank. In November last year donors and lending institutions endorsed the Kenyan Government reforms by ending a two-year freeze on aid with a pledge of over more than $850 million.

The Director-General recognizes that the ILO has had little success in influencing the structural adjustment programmes of the IMF and the World Bank. The ILO must increase its role so that it acts as an equal partner with the Bretton Woods institutions in this field, and make sure that there is a social dimension in adjustment. Or do we have to wait for another "Chiapas". At least that resulted in the Inter-American Development Bank using half of its funds for an improvement of the social infrastructure in Latin America.

The Director-General makes useful proposals on how the ILO can strengthen its activities to address the global employment crisis. However, the idea that more jobs can be created by removing basic worker protection is dangerous and wrong. The ILO must reject any trade-off between the quantity and the quality of employment. It must play an increased role in international policies to boost jobs and tackle poverty worldwide. If, as has been acknowledged by ECOSOC and the World Bank, it is low wages which explain why there is corruption, low productivity and moonlighting in many African public services, then an agreed timetable to achieve wage improvement should be commenced. Working towards "Good governance" is not just a matter of fighting corruption at the top. Technical cooperation can also play an important role in this area, but it should be conducted on a fully tripartite basis and linked to and guided by ILO standards.

The 1995 World Summit for Social Development is a major opportunity for the ILO to reassert its influence in the United Nations system and with the Bretton Woods institutions in particular. It must play a leading part in the preparation, conduct and follow-up of the Summit. There should be full tripartite involvement in the Summit process. We offer the Director-General full support if he campaigns vigorously for this.

Workers do have a sense of what is needed for their country's welfare and can be part of the solution if governments let them. In Public Services International we are convinced that there is a need to alter the tried and failed neo-liberal policies of the last 15 years if we do not want to end up in neo-liberal anarchy. How many more disastrous election results are needed before governments realize that their policies threaten democracy?

Original Russian: Mr. KASKEVITCH (Minister of Labour, the Ukraine) – Permit me first of all to congratulate the President on his election to this high office and to wish him every success in conducting our Conference.

We sincerely congratulate all the participants at the session and the staff members of the Office on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The Report the Director-General prepared for this anniversary session, Defending values, promoting change, contains a profound and rather objective analysis of the experience accumulated over the past years. It also gives recommendations for the adaptation of the ILO and its place in the new and rapidly changing world.

The value of the Report in our view is that it does not look towards the past, but is oriented towards the future. It presents the prospects and the characteristics of a plan of activity for the ILO for the coming decade.

We concur with the conclusion of the Report that the general extension of the market economy, structural transformations and the globalization of economic links all have various consequences, including negative ones – growing unemployment, the impoverishment of the population, the polarization of incomes, marginalization, etc. It is fully understandable that in such circumstances one of the priorities for the future activity of the ILO has to be to strike a balance between reforming the economy and supporting social stability by developing new effective measures for the social protection of the population during the period of market transformations.

This problem is especially important for the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, including for the Ukraine, in so far as the transition from a planned economy to a market economy and the strengthening of democracy can only be possible if there is social stability and the broad support of society for the reforms.

It is no secret that in the Ukraine the process of economic transformations and the social renewal of society are being carried out in a complex and painful way. There has been a drop in the level of production. Inflation has increased and as a result the standard of living of the population has fallen.

At the present time, the Government is developing and implementing urgent measures to overcome hyper-inflation in the Ukraine. This includes a set of measures aimed at bringing down the rate of inflation, reducing the drop in production and preventing a further drop in the standard of living. In the first quarter of this year, thanks to the implementation of monetary, financial and credit policies, the rate of inflation was considerably reduced to 4 per cent per month.

Work has been carried out on reforming the credit, financing and banking systems and to set the stage for monetary reform.

Based on the new realities facing the economy of the Ukraine, we have for the first time drawn up a structural adjustment programme. In it we have defined concepts for the restructuring of the economy, including guidelines and strategies. The tasks to be tackled include improving the social orientation of the economy, the scientific and technological transformation of production, reducing reliance on resources and improving the balance between production and services.

The privatization programme which is aimed at privatizing over 30,000 units in 1994, is being implemented first and foremost by speeding up small-scale privatization, by selling off stock in medium and large-scale enterprises and by providing state support to small and medium-sized businesses.

Among the measures adopted to create a normal investment climate, the State has adopted a programme to attract foreign investment, to define priority sectors for foreign investment, to identify tax benefits and insurance guarantees and to improve the legal regulation of foreign investment. We are also developing infrastructure for international business.

We are extremely grateful for the active participation of the ILO in promoting social reform in the Ukraine in the process of the transition to the market economy. I should like in particular to mention the seminars held in the Ukraine with the participation of international experts in labour statistics, the establishment of a modern system for occupational classifications, the development of enterprises and cooperative movements, the organization – with the financial assistance of the ILO – of training courses for Ukrainian specialists in study centres in Germany, Italy and the Netherlands and the creation in the Ukraine of a national centre for labour productivity.

The Government of the Ukraine is very interested in the active involvement of the ILO in the development of a system for the training and retraining of supervisory staff to meet the needs of structural adjustment, privatization and the development of small-scale cooperation in accordance with the provisions of ILO Convention No. 144 on tripartite consultation. For very obvious reasons, we are particularly interested in the initiation of ILO activities to work out systems of vocational and social rehabilitation for workers suffering from the consequences of the accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power station.

With respect to the future work of the ILO, we believe we have to emphasize the need to maintain in the future such traditional programmes as the Organization's standard-setting activity. The importance of its development and its further improvement are referred to in the three basic themes given in the report: the adaptation of standard-setting activities to correspond more closely to real and vital needs, the opening up of new prospects in promoting basic social rights, and the creation of new possibilities of interaction between international labour standards and the development of international trade.

In this connection I should like to mention that work aimed at ratification by Ukraine of the international instruments of the ILO has recently been stepped up. We consider that in the current complex situation, the ratification by the Ukrainian Parliament of six important ILO Conventions in just the past year is a positive response to the appeal of the Director-General to mark the 75th anniversary of the ILO by ratifying its instruments.

The delegation of Ukraine shares the view of the Director-General on the need to review a number of permanent functions of the ILO and to make a number of organizational and structural changes in the International Labour Office, with the aim of adapting its activity to find solutions to the new social and labour problems, and especially to those arising as many countries undergo the transition to the market economy. We support the initiative of the delegation of Belarus, which suggested the creation of a special subdivision to deal with questions relating to labour activity in the CIS countries. We hope that the problems of the countries in transition will be dealt with as a priority of ILO activity. This is already the case in a number of other bodies and organizations within the UN system, in accordance with resolutions Nos. 47/187 and 48/181 of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

We fully support the proposal to extend the competence of the ILO in the areas of the development of socially oriented patterns of growth and economic reform, employment and income analysis in the world and also the study of the influence on employment and income of economic and financial policy. The ILO, we are convinced, has to play the leading role in the preparations for the World Summit for Social Development which is going to take place in 1995, in particular in the establishment and application of supervisory machineries, analysis, regulation and consultation concerning worldwide development trends, the strengthening of international cooperation and the development of uniform socio-economic policies aimed at solving social and labour problems.

In conclusion, permit me to express my conviction that our Organization, enriched with the wisdom of 75 years of experience, will discover new approaches and will find a new impetus in order to achieve the noble aims enshrined in its Constitution.

Original Russian: Mr. SCHERBAKOV (President, General Confederation of Trade Unions) – First of all permit me to congratulate the President on his election to this responsible and distinguished office. We would like to express our conviction that with his experience and authority, he will be able to dispense with the tasks facing him and successfully chair this extremely important anniversary session of the Conference.

This year we are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The founding principles of the ILO's activities throughout the years are still topical and viable. This proves that it remains the most important international socio-economic mechanism and a valuable instrument for the development of labour relations.

The topic of the Director-General's Report Defending values, promoting change invites us, on the one hand, to look at how far we have already come and, on the other, to consider how best we can adapt the ILO to the fundamental changes taking place in the world.

Three "geopolitical upheavals" mentioned in the Report are so far-reaching and deep-seated that we are forced to think seriously about the basic thrust of ILO activity: "the disappearance of the communist bloc" which has had a profound influence on the whole course of world development; the speeding up of the process of the globalization of the economy leading, as justly noted in the Report, to a growth in international trade, international capital flows, foreign investment, interaction in financial markets and to a stronger role for transnational enterprises in the sphere of economic activity; and a radical transformation of the labour market which has engendered new social problems and enhanced and deepened inequalities between people.

We consider that on the basis of this largely accurate analysis, we must take stock of ILO activity and the prospects for its development.

We are fully convinced that standard-setting must continue as the main thrust of ILO activity. Its Conventions and Recommendations make up the true world compendium of labour legislation. I do not think that there is even one country in which the unions and workers fail to recognize how useful and necessary they are.

Of course, some standards cannot keep up with the tide of change sweeping through the world. Others seem to be too stringent. However, neither their essence, nor the very principle of standard-setting, nor the majority of the standards adopted have lost any of their significance.

The Report rightly asserts that the globalization of the economy and its consequences make it necessary to amend standards and make them more flexible. In this context, the idea of establishing procedures for mediation and voluntary arbitration is to be applauded.

However, it is obviously premature to speak about "the decline of the Nation State", of a society in which the State plays a regulatory role in socio-economic structures.

State mechanisms continue to dominate labour relations. This means that, when formulating national legislation and finding solutions to social and labour problems, we must continue to be guided by ILO standards. At the same time, we should try to ensure that as many Conventions as possible are ratified by member States of the ILO. Here, there is an important role to be played by the social partners, including the trade unions, which have a vested interest in strengthening the legal basis to protect workers' interests.

The trade unions of the CIS countries were actively involved in the process of standard-setting at the national level and have come out decisively in favour of the ratification and application of ILO standards in national labour legislation. It is in no small part due to them that new Members of the ILO such as Azerbaijan and Kyrgyzstan have ratified the Forty-Hour Week Convention, 1935 (No. 47), and the Workmen's Compensation (Occupation Diseases) Convention (Revised), 1934 (No. 42), respectively.

This is why we are concerned by the attempt of certain parties to call into doubt the basic principles and aims of the ILO and undermine the basis of its standard-setting activity. This was clearly and unambiguously stated in September 1993 at the second Congress of the GCTU.

The Director-General's Report rightly points out that the profound crisis in the world is engendering new and serious social problems. We can but agree that the ILO must pay closer attention to finding solutions to them.

Indeed, transformations under way in the world present us with a paradox. On the one hand, we have the globalization of the economy, which is having a profound effect on progress and stabilizing standards of living.

On the other hand, these processes are also leading to considerable difficulties in terms of finding solutions to social problems. The vast army of the unemployed, the vertiginous growth of social inequality, the appearance even in the most developed countries of new forms of poverty, the increase in the number of migrant workers and the expansion of the informal sector of the economy all call for urgent measures to be taken. It is logical that the ILO should not remain on the sidelines.

Proof of the ILO's commitment to the ideals of social justice is the active support it has given to the idea of convening a World Summit for Social Development. We hope that this meeting will make it possible to create an international instrument for the effective monitoring, analysis and regulation of basic development trends, and will serve as a stimulus for the strengthening of cooperation in finding solutions to the most acute social problems.

The countries of our region, in the throes of the transition from centralized planned economies to market relations, are particularly sensitive to how urgent it is to find solutions to these burning problems.

Hasty, ill-thought-out methods of reforming the economy in our countries have led to the acute impoverishment of the population and social disintegration. From day to day the problem of unemployment is worsening. The number of employed, just over the past year, has dropped by 1.7 million persons, but this is merely the tip of the iceberg of real unemployment.

The GCTU sees combating unemployment as one of the priorities of trade unions. We recently set out our concern at the serious situation in our region with regard to employment and the payment of wages on time in an address to the heads of Governments and States of the CIS. The Executive Committee of the GCTU warned in particular that it could not exclude the possibility of trade unions appealing to international organizations if the unprecedented harm to the human rights provided for in national legislation and ILO Conventions is not halted.

We share the assessment of the Director-General on the situation in Central and Eastern Europe. The situation there is indeed dramatic and we think it is therefore too optimistic to conclude that "this is merely a transitional phenomena and the situation in these countries" will soon improve. On the whole, the Report provides a realistic assessment of the social situation throughout the world and makes interesting concrete proposals with regard to ILO activity. In particular, we would like to support the proposal on the presentation to the International Labour Conference of an annual report of an authoritative analysis of the situation of employment and incomes throughout the world.

However, it is also important that such a report should not only analyse the situation but seek to propose alternatives for national and international policy which would help to solve the eternal dilemma surrounding the need for balance between ensuring economic growth and the urgent need to support employment and raise the income of workers, particularly for the poorest sectors.

There is no doubt also with respect to the proposal on the regular convening of a high level meeting in the framework of the Governing Body on employment and trends in world economic development.

However, everything will depend on how effective the measures proposed will be in practice and their influence on international policy.

In conclusion, permit me to express solidarity with the position of the Director-General that confidence in the ILO depends on the degree of its influence in each State. As the Report points out, this depends heavily on the authority of the tripartite participants of the ILO in these countries, their ability to influence the drafting of legislation and participate in it.

To this end the close cooperation and active participation of all Members of the ILO and above all the trade unions, who express the vital interests of the workers, are for us the prerequisite for the success of ILO activities in the future.

Original Spanish: Mr. MENÉNDEZ CASTEJÓN (Employers' adviser, Guatemala) – On behalf of the employers of Guatemala, I should like to extend to the President and the other Officers of the Conference our warmest congratulations on their election to such high office and on the excellent way in which they are conducting our proceedings. I wish them every success in discharging their duties.

It gives me great satisfaction to have this opportunity to represent Guatemalan employers and to be able to explain our points of view and describe the situation that our country is going through as well as the efforts being made by employers to consolidate democracy and peace in Guatemala.

We have read very carefully the Director-General's Report and we should like to congratulate him on producing such an important document. We find that the subjects developed in the Report and the different opinions expressed to be most appropriate.

A rapidly changing world, the disappearance of the Eastern bloc and, as a consequence, the end of a bipolar world, the triumph of market economies, globalization of the economy, etc., these are all very important and topical issues.

In his Report, the Director-General points to three issues in particular: how to achieve sustainable growth, that growth must lead to the creation of jobs and that jobs must be of an acceptable quality.

For the employers of Guatemala, there is one very important problem which takes precedence over the three issues I have just mentioned, and I refer to the problem of peace.

Only in a context of peace is it possible to create the right conditions for investment, development and the generation of employment and prosperity in general.

Guatemala has been the victim of internal armed conflict for 34 years now, caused by terrorists of a group known as the Guatemalan National Revolutionary Union, the URNG, – a hurdle we must overcome in our economic growth and our fight against poverty. This war has succeeded in retarding economic development and social development in our country.

This terrorist movement has its roots in Marxist-Leninist ideology and has already claimed more than 100,000 human lives, creating 43,000 refugees according to the figures given by humanitarian organizations.

At present, more than 1 million Guatemalans have been displaced as a result of terrorist violence. We cannot tell these people about the application of international labour standards or about workers' rights because they simply do not have work. What is most important in our country is to give them productive jobs, and for this we need investment which in turn requires peace and tranquillity.

Furthermore, we employers must work and create jobs. At the same time, we have to cope with extortionate war taxes, assault, blackmail, abductions and all other kinds of offences, and our activity as employers is extremely difficult. None the less, we continue and will continue in our endeavour to maintain the country's levels of productivity. Development is impossible in a setting of violence and war. The ILO must ensure the application of standards in its member States.

But how is this possible when there is no work? In the rural areas of Guatemala many people do not have productive jobs, so there is no application of international labour standards. What we do have are isolated groups trapped in a subsistence economy. There are no trade unions because there are no enterprises and these persons stand isolated from any standards. Therefore, it is first necessary to incorporate them into development and the economy before turning to other priorities.

We in the developing countries need more than anything else an environment of peace and stability to generate new investment and new enterprises. We need this more than sophisticated labour standards, though this does not mean that the latter are not important.

It is necessary once and for all to end this violent conflict and sterile confrontation which is preventing Guatemalans from developing and working in peace and tranquillity.

Against this background, we the employers of Guatemala ask the ILO to focus part of its endeavours on the generation, promotion and development of the enterprise as a means of creating jobs.

It is unthinkable that, when the whole world is celebrating the end of the East-West conflict, and when the international community is adapting to the demise of communist regimes, in Guatemala the anachronistic URNG should be pursuing its terrorist acts on the basis of communist doctrines which are now outdated, while maintaining the people in a climate of violence.

Throughout the American continent there are only four internal armed conflicts. They involve the Shining Path in Peru, the URNG in Guatemala, the Zapatista movement in Chiapas, Mexico, and the ELN-FARC in Columbia.

The international community must assist in ending such conflicts that have caused these countries such serious losses, particularly in terms of human life.

The peace processes in El Salvador, Nicaragua and in the Middle East serve as an example for the entire world. They have demonstrated that with unswerving support by the international community, it is possible to end conflicts whatever their nature.

Another section of the Director-General's Report talks about the globalization of the economy and competitiveness, but for our country it is extremely difficult to become part of this globalization since our circumstances are not conducive to competitiveness.

The internal armed conflicts in the country are not only draining our resources, because we have to keep an army operational, but are also consuming our national efforts to keep a check on these terrorists, and all this to the detriment of our struggle against poverty, to the detriment of productive investment which would generate new jobs.

The Director-General also deals with the issue of he ILO and the world economy and the problem of economic growth and job creation. Guatemalan employers would like the Director-General to comment on the obstacles for democratic countries constituted by armed conflicts and by the presence of irregular orces such as the URNG which are trying to prevent, by using violence, the consolidation of democracy and also to prevent growth and development in our country. This is of cardinal importance in dealing with the social aspects of the globalization of the economy.

We the Guatemalan employers would like the democratic nations to lend support to lawfully constituted governments and to our democratic process, as well as helping us in establishing peace as a fundamental and essential condition for eradicating poverty and in achieving full respect for human, civil, political, economic and social rights. This can only be achieved if the rule of law is observed.

We would also call on the URNG to end the violent conflict as well as its terrorist acts against the economic infrastructure of Guatemala. We would call on it to stop destroying bridges, to stop destroying the energy distribution system in the country which we need, as we do peace, as a fundamental prerequisite for our human development.

Original Russian: Mr. KUNYAVSKY (Employers' delegate, Belarus) – First of all I would like to congratulate the President and his Vice-Presidents on their unanimous election to these high, distinguished offices and wish them every success in conducting the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that the President's high degree of professionalism and rich practical experience will make it possible for us to carry out the work of our Conference with success and to deal with the tasks before us.

I consider my statement today to be a kind of divine opportunity, in so far as it is taking place at the time of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization which has had a productive existence and record of work. In so far as the tone and thrust of our deliberations has been set by the extremely interesting, profound and far-reaching Report of the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, it is to this Report that I intend to devote my statement, which will address the values the ILO must defend.

Naturally, I am not going to, and am not in a position to, cover the whole range of problems raised in the Director-General's Report on all ILO activities. I will deal merely with the values and changes which relate to the development of entrepreneurship in the countries of the former USSR at present and in the near future.

As in the Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia, throughout the Director-General's Report the guiding light is the idea of improving the activity of our Organization with the aim of strengthening social justice. We can only welcome this idea. But it would be erroneous in our view when examining the problems of today's world to limit the concept of social justice merely to relations between the traditional social partners within countries. We now have to extend this concept to include the conditions and possibilities of the countries which are trying to introduce a market economy and develop enterprise to provide employment and material well-being. We also have to do this because the market economy is generally a basis for democracy, and thus also for the realization of the ILO's ideal of social justice and peace.

The Report correctly notes that the market economy has become the model for all countries. But between the adoption of the market model and its practical implementation, we have seen that there is a long way to go. In the countries of the former USSR undergoing the transformation to a market economy there are considerable obstacles – the anti-market mentality of the people, lack of experience and skills, hostility to entrepreneurship and social differentiation, opposition to privatization, a reliance on state paternalism and egalitarianism, etc. But the greatest risk is the fact that the formation of market relations in our countries is taking place against a background of serious socio-economic crises which have led to a drop in the standard of living of the overwhelming majority of the population. Opponents of the market economy, and thus opponents of entrepreneurship, are trying, not without some success, to convince people that all the harm comes from the market and from the market economy. In such circumstances it is not impossible that political forces may come to power and may try to halt market reforms and restore a centrally planned system. Thus, we believe that the highest priority should be given to technical projects aimed at strengthening market relations and helping employers and their organizations; and that this fits into the framework of the activities the Director-General introduces by affirming that the market economy has become a model for all countries.

I have to say that employers' organizations in my republic are already receiving quite solid support from the ILO and I have been authorized to express our gratitude to the departments dealing with Europe and entrepreneurship, as well as others within the ILO, and also to the Turin Centre for the aid that they have given to employers in my republic. A number of seminars have been held with the support and participation of ILO specialists. There is also the remarkable and promising project for the conversion of military bases located in our territory into employment zones, and there have been entrepreneurship and energy conservation seminars as well. Bearing in mind the specificities of my republic, and in particular the relatively slow pace of reform, I have been empowered by my organization, the Union of Entrepreneurs and Leaseholders of Belarus, to ask the ILO within its field of competence and in accordance with its values to work together with our experts to give some thought to the possibility of drawing up an integrated programme for the development of entrepreneurship and for the strengthening and improvement of employers' organizational structures. I understand that such a request might seem to be immodest in so far as the pace of reform is slow, not only in my country, but elsewhere as well. But this kind of programme could be useful not only for Belarus, but also for other countries of the former USSR. The framework of such an integrated programme could be a basis for the practical implementation of measures to: improve conditions of work; ensure freedom of association; eliminate all forms of discrimination; carry out collective bargaining; and create genuine employers' and workers' organizations.

I believe the development and implementation of this kind of programme would be a practical response to the need mentioned by the Director-General to adapt the ILO to the constant changes taking place throughout the world. In this case, the ILO would act as an adviser, capable of giving useful suggestions to solve urgent problems and providing a place to exchange ideas and share our experience. At the same time the ILO would fulfil the role referred to by the Director-General as being of such importance: that of influencing the mechanisms driving the world economy.

Given all that I have said, we think that the Director-General's idea is highly useful regarding the need for a kind of "soft law" with shorter periods of validity, less limited in nature, with sets of regulations, practical guidelines and directives. This kind of recommendation would even be sufficiently acceptable for clear opponents of market economics, as these recommendations will always be based on the idea of social justice and social partnership. At the same time, they would be more comprehensible for our countries which have weak democratic traditions and a low level of development of market structures.

We are extremely impressed by the proposal of the Director-General with respect to ILO activities in the light of the globalization of the economy and international competition.

Our countries' recent political independence has brought us face to face with these problems. Since independence is new to us, these problems must be dealt with by the Government, workers' organizations and employers' organizations alike. The solutions proposed by the Director-General seem to us to be fully acceptable and they call for no changes in the ILO Constitution. But all of these solutions require a great deal of work. For the moment they are expressed in very general terms.

I particularly welcome the part of the Director-General's Report dealing with the sources of information and analytical materials. Indeed, we do not need abstract academic studies, but material which deals with the major problems of practical significance.

I have to emphasize that it is in our interests that the ILO has begun implementing the policy of active partnership with the aim of bringing it closer to all the social partners, and has also enhanced the follow-up and the quality of technical services. We believe that this kind of policy will make it possible successfully to solve complex problems, and particularly those faced by countries in transition and taking part in the globalization of the world.

I should also like to address another question that is very topical for us: the training of employers' supervisory staff, beginning from a very young age. This is extremely important for our country. We have already been carrying out such work for three years and we have seen some remarkably able children. But our limited resources do not permit us to carry on this work at an appropriately modern technical level. We thus require the assistance of the ILO and hope that the Organization will respond to our requests.

In conclusion I would like to congratulate the ILO and all its Members on this anniversary. I would like to express my conviction that the ILO in the future will continue to serve its noble aims, and reiterate that the employers of the young sovereign State, the Republic of Belarus, will do their part to strengthen the organization.

Original Spanish: Mr. SEMEREL (representative, World Federation of Agriculture and Food Workers) – I would like to congratulate Brother Charles Gray on his election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference and also the Vice-Presidents, in my own name and in the name of the World Federation of Agriculture and Food Workers. It is an honour for the workers to preside over the Conference on this occasion, after 25 years.

I would also like to welcome and congratulate the new member States of the ILO family and celebrate the return of the Republic of South Africa.

I would like to congratulate the International Labour Organization on its 75th anniversary, and on the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

I would like to thank the ILO for its great contribution to improving the world of work, living conditions and human rights. At the same time, I want to make a few general considerations on the Report of Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO.

I read the Director-General's Report with great interest. Both the Report entitled Defending values, promoting change and the Report entitled Activities of the ILO, 1992-1993. Both Reports reflect the wealth of the 75 years of the International Labour Organization's existence, which we are commemorating today.

However, I must say that the triumph of the market economy, although it has become almost universal, has brought with it many problems about which the workers cannot remain silent, such as the unemployment situation, relocation, loss of freedom of association in many cases, adjustments, and other inescapable problems that have affected the poorest sectors of society, especially in the countries of the Third World.

Here, I regretfully disagree with the views of the Director-General of the ILO. I do not think the workers universally accept the market economy, although we recognize that it has many positive aspects. But workers will never be able to accept a system which considers merchandise more important than human labour.

From this rostrum I would like to denounce the difficult situation in which the workers of the Ihro-Lamé enterprise of the Côte d'Ivoire in Africa find themselves. They were repressed by force and expelled from the enterprise because they set up a union. Since then, the workers and their families have been in a desperate situation. Destitution and malnutrition have got worse day by day and 15 people have already died of illness and exhaustion.

In Paraguay, two peasants were assassinated in the last two months (April and May) and tens more have been wounded and imprisoned, in the struggle to defend human rights and freedom of association. Esteban León Balbuena, from Itapuay Department, and Sebastián Larrosa from Tacuara in San Pedro Department, Paraguay, were assassinated just a few weeks ago.

In Costa Rica, 18 banana production workers were wounded whilst striking against a wage cut; the British company Geest Caribbean fired 600 workers.

In Guatemala, as well, a wave of persecution broke out against a group of policemen who wanted form a trade union. Eligio Quej Morán, a member the ad hoc committee, was tortured and was given drug injection.

These and other events show how the labour sittion is steadily getting worse, despite the good tidgs proclaimed by the representatives of neo-libersm.

The World Federation of Agriculture and Food orkers, a member of the World Confederation of bour, reiterates its rejection of the European nion's decision to limit banana purchases. This desion has led to extensive unemployment, and has duced wages. The European Union's action here s hit workers: they are always the ones who suffer om discriminatory measures.

In September this year, the World Federation of griculture and Food Workers will organize a semir attended by agriculture and food workers from frica, Latin America, Asia and Eastern Europe to alyse the impact and future of the agricultural secr in the world's poorest countries. This educational ent will, I hope, help us draw up criteria on food fety, the environment and ecology, agricultural proction, international labour regulations, the involement of women and young people in trade unions, d other issues of general interest to Third World orkers.

I would also like to use this opportunity to repeat e appeal I made last year to countries with overseas territories or dependencies and associated states. They should allow workers in these territories to participate in ILO activities, meetings and annual Conference sessions as general delegates. Either that, or we have to try and find a formula which would allow workers from these territories to participate without being part of metropolitan delegations. A typical example that is of great concern to us is Puerto Rico.

I would once again like to emphasize the principle of tripartism where workers can freely express their views and counterbalance government unemployment proposals. This is one of the ILO's strengths and it must be preserved. Tripartism based on consensus and dialogue in finding solutions to problems should have its reflection in all countries in the active and decisive participation of unionized workers.

In my capacity as General Secretary of the Curaçao Workers Trade Union Conference, I have, as promised last year, brought with me a First Day Cover for 1 June 1994 issued by the Government of the Netherlands Antilles commemorating the ILO's 75th anniversary. I would like to hand it to the President of the Conference, Brother Gray; however, since he is not present, I will hand it to the Vice-President, who, I am sure, will pass it on to Brother Gray.

(The Conference adjourned at 6 p.m.)

SIXTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The Sixth Report of the Selection Committee, reproduced in Provisional Record No. 3E. If there are no objections we will consider this report adopted.

(The report is adopted).

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. CASIANO (Minister of Labour and Administrative Reform, Sudan) – Allow me at the outset to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of this Conference.

This historical Conference, which coincides with our celebration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, avails us with the opportunity to recall the values of our Organization. We have to seize this opportunity to see to what extent we have been loyal to these values, and what awaits us by way of improving our record in this respect.

The Report of the Director-General, Defending values, promoting change, presents a host of proposals and suggestions. These proposals are geared towards paving the path for the ILO to stand up to its new role and activity, in the context of the changing world. We have intellectually enjoyed the essence of these proposals. However, it seems to us very difficult to comment on them in detail due to the short time period. Instead we will limit ourselves to highlighting some observations on a number of aspects of the Report.

The ILO Constitution of 1919 is enhanced by the Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944. In our view that confirms the validity and relevance of these values to the world of today. After a lapse of three-quarters of a century, it is disturbing to note that the record of social justice in most parts of the world is disappointing. The majority of the human race remains poor, still suffering from undernourishment, lack of adequate shelter, disease and illiteracy.

Adhering to the values of social justice, we would like to put emphasis on a number of issues that address this appalling situation:

First, the ILO should maintain its objectives of combating unemployment, alleviating poverty and promoting participation;

Second, promotion of strategies for human development, employment and income distribution and basic needs;

Third, settlement of civil conflicts and wars through dialogue by eliminating the basic causes and addressing the negative effects;

Lastly, the triumph of the market economy should not be allowed to be a triumph over the poor of the world, in the context of adverse and unfair terms of trade in relation to Third World countries.

It is worth noting that the ILO has not remained static over the years, since the Declaration of Philadelphia. A number of changes and amendments have been introduced in its structure, regulations and even in the Constitution to cope with changing situations and circumstances.

In view of the new emerging political and socio-economic development, both at the national and international levels, the ILO is destined to go on evolving its structures and promoting ways and means of action to meet the new challenges. A number of programmes and activities could be mentioned to demonstrate the nature of these challenges. We underline some of them as follows:

First, the process of standard setting needs to be explored and studied in depth to see to what extent the existing standards are relevant. Moreover, identification of the genuine reasons and difficulties facing member States in ratifying these standards merits priority.

Second, the 1986 amendments of the Constitution, namely the broadening of the participation of member States in the Governing Body and reforming the voting system, needs the political will of member States in order to generate action.

Third, due to urgent needs of the Third World countries, the credibility of the ILO lies in the providing technical cooperation. Hence there should be no conditionality that hampers the attainment of the ILO objectives in alleviating poverty and combating unemployment.

Fourth, the introduction of an active partnership approach is highly appreciated. The multidisciplinary teams which will operate within this system should be given the authority and the necessary flexibility to tackle the issues at the level of constituents in the best possible way.

Fifth, we fully share the feelings of the Director-General as regards the initiative of launching a new world employment programme because a job opportunity is a value in itself, enhancing the dignity and honour of human beings.

Sixth, the ILO, inspired by its values and armed by its performance in combating poverty and unemployment, is well suited to claim competence in the labour and social fields. Therefore, it should be given the opportunity to play a primary role in international policy-making.

On our part, a number of highlights: First, special importance has been given to the promotion of the agricultural sector, through the provision of funds, inputs and incentives. This is intended to broaden the productive base and improve the lot of almost 70 per cent of our labour force in the rural areas. Second, emphasis has been put on human development. Third, on the labour scene, labour and social security laws have been revised to give more incremental benefits to the workers. Fourth, a Supreme Tripartite Council for Wages was established in 1990 to review the minimum wage periodically, to offset the negative impact of inflation on the real wages of workers. Fifth, to end the civil war in southern Sudan, the Government is anxious to achieve a peaceful settlement through dialogue and negotiations. The recent peace talks in Nairobi have succeeded in solving the humanitarian issues. We are looking forward to further talks in Nairobi as scheduled. Sixth, the Sudanese Government is implementing a federal system geared towards the attainment of balanced development, equal distribution of wealth and power sharing.

As Sudan joins the world community in celebrating the 75th anniversary of the ILO, we have recently organized a number of tripartite activities to commemorate this occasion.

We wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the people of South Africa for having abolished apartheid and elected their democratic Government. We hope that the sufferings of the people of Palestine, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Somalia and Rwanda will come to an end.

Sudan also welcomes the newly affiliated member States to the ILO. We wish our Organization all success and prosperity.

Mr. MARCUS (representative of the International Co-operative Alliance) – It is a privilege to address this tripartite body with which our organization has had such close relations since 1919. The founders of the ILO understood that cooperatives were to play an important role in the promotion of economic growth and social justice for working men and women. It is for this reason that the ILO created the cooperatives activities programme which promotes and assists cooperatives worldwide, and after years of informal collaboration, also formally granted the International Co-operative Alliance – the ICA – general advisory status in 1948, a privilege which is as you know limited to a very small number of NGOs.

Much could be said about the collaboration and numerous joint activities during the 75 years which have passed. Allow me to mention just three areas where the assistance of the ILO has been invaluable to the ICA and the cooperative movement worldwide: expertise on cooperative legislation, leadership in human resources development of cooperatives, and the promotion of the role of women in cooperatives.

This being noted, please allow me to say a few words about the ICA – what it is, what it does, and in which areas we hope that the ILO and the ICA will work together in our common aim of improving the lives of so many. The ICA is a child of the nineteenth century. It was created in 1895 by cooperatives of consumers, farmers and workers as the ideological apex and as a network to bring together, develop and represent all cooperatives. Unlike most NGOs of global membership, the ICA survived both hot and cold wars.

Over the years our membership has grown. Today, the ICA is made up of 224 national organizations from 101 countries. Of nearly 730 million cooperators in the ICA's membership, more than half live in Asia today. The majority of the individual cooperators which are affiliated to the ICA are farmers. Ninety-nine years ago, the majority were European consumers. Ever since the 1950s the ICA has been heavily engaged in cooperative development in the South, often together with the ILO and government development agencies. On the request of our members, the ICA opened regional offices to implement ICA development programmes. Today, the ICA has regional offices covering Africa, Asia and Latin America. Perhaps I should also mention that the ICA headquarters is located across the street from the ILO office here in Geneva.

Let me now turn to the future, and specifically to four areas where we are likely to have common interests and responsibilities.

Firstly, the ICA shares the preoccupation of the ILO and its member States with regard to the growing employment problems and the strains provoked on social welfare systems. Many OECD countries are presently exploring the idea of welfare systems which are dependent less on taxes and more on self-paid participation. The ICA at the same time is witnessing a growth of worker and service cooperatives. The cooperatives are being formed to address some of the problems of unemployment and dwindling social structures. I have just come from the Fourth World Conference on Specialized Policy for Workers' Cooperatives. Four hundred delegates representing some 100 million workers throughout the world met in Spain. The ILO was of course represented and able to contribute to the proceedings. Together we hope to find insightful ways that cooperatives can address the long-term and changing employment problems which exist in many societies.

My second point is this: the ICA would like to continue to work with the ILO with regard to the relations with cooperatives of governments, employers' and workers' organizations. Government and political leaders often want to incorporate successful cooperatives in their national economies. The message which both the ICA and the ILO have tried to bring in all our discussions and meetings is that cooperatives must be treated as private organizations if they are to succeed and contribute to national economies. Cooperatives have to be formed voluntarily, be based on self help, and be governed democratically by their own members. With the support and collaboration of the ILO, the ICA has convened a number of conferences in Africa, Asia and Latin America. Cooperative ministers, government officials and regional cooperative leaders have discussed the successes and failures of their cooperative movements, have formulated recommendations and have organized follow-ups to continue dialogue between governments and cooperatives. The next Cooperative Ministerial Conference will be held this year in Sri Lanka. More will, and have to, follow.

The third point is that we would like to collaborate with the ILO and the cooperative activities programme in promoting cooperatives which share the basic interests of its members. For example, there are still very few consumer cooperatives in cities like Nairobi, Cairo, Delhi, Beijing, Rio de Janeiro and Mexico City, and not because they are not needed. I have recently seen major achievements in São Paulo where consumer cooperatives are allowing ordinary people to improve their economic and social situations. The time is almost ripe for what once happened in Europe with regard to the consumer movement. What is missing are leaders. Once they were found in the trade unions. We should all look for them there today.

My fourth and last point deals with the cooperatives in Central and Eastern Europe. The cooperative movement in this region was strong prior to 1917 and 1939. We know what has happened since. For the last five years the ICA has been assisting the cooperative movements there to survive and persuading the governments that they are not an invention of the communists. To continue restoring a truly democratic structure and leadership in these cooperatives, the ILO through its cooperative activities programme has also provided much appreciated advice and assistance. In most cases our efforts, together with those of the ILO and others, have brought success. The contribution of cooperatives in Eastern and Central Europe is vital for economic, democratic and social reasons, especially in those countries now suffering from many capitalistic excesses. We look forward to collaboration between the ICA and the trade unions to address some of these new problems.

With those remarks made, I am now at the end of my intervention. When I look at you, my audience, from this tripartite body, I have a strange feeling. I do not feel like I have addressed a triangle, but rather I feel as though I have been speaking to you from the fourth corner of a square. Thank you all, and not least the cooperative activities programme of the ILO.

Mr. McAULEY (Employers' delegate, Ireland) – We welcome the opportunity to comment on the Director-General's Report entitled Defending values, promoting change. Our comments, because of time limitations, must be brief and selective. They concern only a limited number of the many important issues raised in the Report.

In the light of the remark by the Director-General "that the time has come to make a new overall assessment of the ILO's aims and means of action" we feel it would be useful for both the constituents of the ILO and the Office if the issues raised in this Report could be the subject of consideration at national level. This would give all concerned a better insight into the critical problems facing the ILO and allow the Office to learn what its constituents expect from the Organization in the future. The general discussion at this Conference should only be regarded as the beginning of a process of assessment and evaluation.

There is no doubt in our mind that the ILO must remain a tripartite organization. This unique characteristic allows the representatives of governments, employers and workers to participate in the formulation of international social policy. The Irish Business and Employers Confederation has been deeply involved over many years in trilateral consultations and negotiations at national level, and the economy and society have benefited from the process. Recently the Confederation was engaged with the Government, trade unions and farmers in negotiating a three-year "Programme for Competitiveness and Work." This programme contains, among other things, an agreement between the social partners on the level of pay increases over the next three years. This is the third successive three-year programme to emerge from tripartite negotiations since 1987. Although these programmes are not a panacea for the solution of deeply-rooted national economic and social problems, they represent a firm commitment by the social partners to work together to alleviate these difficulties and, hopefully, to overcome them eventually. Taken together, these programmes have made a significant contribution towards the rehabilitation of the economy and have established a sound basis for significant non-inflationary growth. As in the case of other countries, the key problem is to try to ensure that economic growth is translated into much-needed employment opportunities. Tripartism is also a prominent feature of our social and labour market institutions. As a consequence, they are generally effective and have considerable respect and support within the community.

From our experience, we consider that the strengthening of tripartism in the ILO requires that greater weight should be given in future to the voice and industry and business. In particular, we believe the Organization would benefit from an inflow of staff and experts who have practical experience of working in modern business. It would also create a better balance of experience and disciplines within the Office.

The Director-General speaks in his Report about the "triumph of the market economy" and comments that "within a matter of just a few years" the market economy has become the universally accepted standard. It is in this particular context that we put forward this suggestion. To accomplish its mission in the world, the ILO must be at least as concerned with the wealth-creating process as with the question of the distribution of the rewards of enterprise and work.

We are concerned as an employers' organization at what we perceive to be an ambivalent attitude by the ILO to multinational enterprises. As pointed out in the Report of the Director-General these enterprises control about one-third of the private sector's productive assets worldwide. Because of their importance in creating wealth and employment, the ILO should encourage these undertakings, where appropriate, to become more closely involved through their respective organizations, in the work of the ILO and more directly identified with its objectives. They should not be regarded as convenient targets for continuous criticism.

It was surprising to read in the Director-General's Report a statement to the effect that "the right of workers to information and collective bargaining is time and again rendered meaningless by sudden unilateral decisions to relocate production". It should be recorded that these are isolated incidents and not the norm. The fact is that many multinational enterprises are worldwide leaders in the field of industrial and human relations and observe very high standards in employment conditions. This is one of the reasons why countries compete to attract them to locate in their territories.

We appeal to the ILO to take a more enlightened attitude to their pivotal role in economic development and to try to establish more constructive relationships with these enterprises. They could bring skills and resources which would help the Organization in its work, particularly in the developing countries.

The Director-General deals at considerable length with the issue of the ILO's standard-setting activities. Regretfully, we feel obliged to say that on a number of occasions we have been appalled at the time and money spent on preparing and agreeing texts which are unlikely to make any significant contribution to the extension of social justice in the world or to improving the conditions of work of those they are designed to assist. We have left annual conferences, where these standards are approved, dismayed and with a feeling that the time of many people has been wasted. The current review of the work and functions of the ILO must, therefore, give special attention to the problems of standard setting. It is, of course, a difficult and complex matter. The Director-General has put forward a number of suggestions which merit close examination. However, we do not share his enthusiasm "to seize this unique opportunity to breathe new life into our standard-setting activities". Our preference at this stage of the discussion is to support the suggestion in the Report of an "audit of the relevance of existing standards and of the advisability of maintaining them". There is no doubt that existing standards fall into different categories of importance, and this should be recognized in any new system which may emerge from these consultations. It is possible, for instance, to conceive of a situation where Conventions guaranteeing fundamental human rights would be a condition of ILO membership. Other instruments might more properly be regarded as recommendations or codes of practice. They might have more influence and impact than unratified Conventions. The evidence in the Report regarding the decline in the number of ratifications strongly suggests that the present policy and practice has outlived its usefulness and that a new approach is required.

The idea that the current supervisory and investigatory procedures of the ILO on standards should be supplemented or in some cases replaced by a voluntary mediation and arbitration service should be further developed and considered. Any new approach must take into account the issue of social clauses in international trading arrangements and, in a European context, the development of social action programmes in the European Union. The state objective of these programmes is to limit social dumping and provide a level playing field for cross-border competition within the Union. These are controversial and sensitive issues and failure to examine all their implications objectively could lead to decisions which might be discriminatory and harm, rather than improve, the pursuit of higher standards and welfare.

We believe that in any new framework for ILO activities there should be no diminution of the research and information functions and that programmes for giving practical assistance to tripartite constituents to deal with problems of employment and work should, wherever possible, be extended. We say this from the standpoint of an employers' confederation which has benefited from the ILO's experience and services, and which has contributed in a number of small ways to the work of the ILO in developing countries.

Finally, we see some merit in the proposal that the ILO should be renamed. At present employers and others perceive the ILO as being the workers' organization. This makes it particularly difficult for employers' organizations to secure support for the important work which the ILO undertakes. We trust the Governing Body will give careful consideration to this matter.

Original Arabic: Mr. KHALIL (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should first like to congratulate the President on my own behalf and on behalf of the delegation of the Syrian Arab Republic on the confidence that this Conference has shown in his abilities by electing him to the chair of its 81st Session. We wish him every success in his task and we trust that the discussions and serious dialogue between the three social partners will result in resolutions and recommendations that represent a firm step towards achieving the goals for which the ILO was established.

I see it as my duty to reiterate at this session the aspirations of the Syrian Arab Republic for continued frank and productive cooperation, as in the past, with this venerable Organization and its various organs and committees.

We are committed to achieving the ILO's aims and objectives and we fulfil those commitments and respect all the conclusions of its Conference in the form of resolutions and standards, especially those relating to freedom of association and human rights, since we are a country that is devoted to freedom and its exercise and that venerates and works for what is right. We are sincere and earnest in our endeavours to implement the Conventions and Recommendations in the general interest of the three social partners and for the benefit of the working and productive class in particular. To that end, we are pursuing a policy based on the following statement by the President of the Republic, Mr. Hafez Al-Assad: "We extol labour and working people and we oppose exploitation and exploiters. We are expanding employment and employment opportunities to thwart the aims of all exploiters and parasites."

We wish to draw attention to the fact that we have ratified 46 international labour Conventions and we fully intend to ratify any other Conventions that are consonant with our domestic legislation and our social and economic circumstances.

I should like to refer to the fact that our country, under the guidance of President Hafez Al-Assad, is focusing in particular on cooperation between the three social partners in promoting comprehensive development in all aspects of life and on encouraging expansion employment and employment opportunities in the public, mixed and private sectors by supporting a variety of development projects, the five-year plans and the operational programmes aimed at concurrent economic and social development. In this context, it is making every effort to achieve political, ocial and economic objectives that serve individual ell-being, given its conviction that this is the core nd essence and the ultimate goal of existence.

I wish to express warm thanks and appreciation to ne Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Han- enne, for his outstanding Report entitled Defending alues, promoting change – Social justice in a global conomy: An ILO agenda, in the first chapter of hich he discusses the end of a bipolar world, the iumph of the market economy, a chance for democ- acy, the globalization of the economy, regulation at ne international level, the proliferation of social roblems, inequalities and the widening gap between ne rich and poor countries.

In the second and third chapters the Report dis- usses values and structures of the ILO, the values of oday and the ILO as a relevant organization based n tripartism; adapting standards to real needs, what ubjects to deal with and how to make the best hoice, a better utilization of available instruments, valuating and consolidating standards, new prospec- s for the promotion and supervision of basic social ights and strengthening the international effective- ess of standard-setting action.

Chapters four and five deal with the Organiza- ion's role in the service of its constituents, as a ource of information and analysis, a forum for de- ate, a point of reference and a partner in technical ooperation, and its role in international policy-mak- ng.

The Director-General made a felicitous choice of ubject for his Report to this session, which coincides vith the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th nniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, a reat occasion dear to all our hearts. Our Govern- nent earnestly participated in the observance of hese anniversaries together with the other govern- nents of the Organization's member States. And it vas only natural that it should, given the ILO's un- emitting efforts to address the challenges facing the vorld of work today as a result of the far-reaching hanges associated with major technological ad- ances and the new working methods in enterprises, ontinuing to rely on its unique tripartite structure, vhich today's changing world needs more urgently han ever before in order to establish a just and last- ng world peace based on social justice in accordance vith the content of the Declaration of Philadelphia, vhich sets forth the aims and objectives of the ILO founded on social justice and reaffirms that work is not a commodity and that poverty is a threat to well-being and peace everywhere.

In Part II of his Report, the Director-General drew attention to the many activities undertaken by the ILO during the period 1992-93, including its work in the field of standard setting, industrial relations, labour management and relations, employers' and workers' activities, structural adjustment, employment strategies, active labour-market policies, labour statistics, vocational training, equal employment opportunities for women, the elimination of child labour and the principle of equal treatment for immigrant workers.

We deeply appreciate his efforts and those of the Organization, also in the provision of advisory services for the Arab States, the organization of seminars and vocational training courses, support for development projects in Arab countries, including the Syrian Arab Republic, for example the labour force survey, the project in support of immigration policies and the development project for rural women in cooperation with the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia (ESCWA).

We wish to stress in this connection the importance of ensuring that the Arabic version of documents relating to Conference agenda items arrives by the date specified in the Standing Orders of the Conference, inasmuch as any delay in obtaining these documents reduces our ability to accord them due attention and present the requisite responses and proposals.

I should like to refer to the many steps that are being undertaken in our country to promote social justice in a variety of areas and to the fact that the public, mixed and private sectors are engaged in joint action to further the economic and social development of our country, to create employment opportunities for all citizens and to improve their standard of living and quality of life.

Our Government continues to strive earnestly to achieve a just and comprehensive peace based on implementation of the resolutions of international legislative bodies and on the principle of land for peace, that is to say total and complete withdrawal from occupied Arab territory in return for comprehensive peace.

The Syrian Arab Republic has opened its doors to the peace process and reaffirms its full commitment to the Madrid formula. It is impossible for it to accept any authority other than that on which the peace process was based, as was emphatically stated at the historic meeting in Geneva between Hafez Al-Assad and Bill Clinton.

On behalf of the delegation of the Syrian Arab Republic, I should like to congratulate the Sultanate of Oman, which has just become a Member of the Organization, as well as Tajikistan and other countries attending the proceedings of this Conference for the first time.

Last but not least, I should like to welcome the end of the three-century-old apartheid regime in South Africa and the free elections there that have raised the great African freedom fighter Nelson Mandela to the office of President of that brave country, which has been turned into a democratic State, abandoning racial discrimination forever. I wish to extend the heartiest congratulations to that country and its leader and to commend our Organization, which did its fair share to topple the odious apartheid regime.

In conclusion, the Syrian Arab Republic warmly thanks the ILO, its Director-General and its staff for their commendable work. We also hope that this Conference will adopt constructive resolutions and recommendations that help to enhance the status of the ILO in its work on behalf of the three social partners, strengthening the bonds of friendship and cooperation between the members of the international community, for therein lie the welfare of peoples and nations and our hopes for building a society based on justice, democracy and prosperity.

Mrs. CARON (Government delegate, Canada) – I would like first of all to congratulate the President on his well-deserved election and to warmly welcome the Republic of South Africa as it rejoins the Organization.

The Director-General is to be congratulated for his thought-provoking Report to the Conference. In this year of the ILO's 75th anniversary, the time has indeed come to reflect on the challenges ahead and on the focus of future ILO activities.

In recent years, we have seen the end of the Cold War, a growing acceptance of the market economy, the expansion of international trade and increased mobility of both capital and technology.

Virtually every member State of the ILO is grappling with acute problems of structural unemployment, growing polarization between high-skilled and low-skilled labour and increasingly prohibitive costs of social security programmes.

A current priority of the Canadian Government is to develop a wide-ranging and effective employment strategy to put people back to work.

In January 1994, the Canadian Government launched a comprehensive review of all social security and labour market programmes as an integral part of that strategy. The review will focus on issues involving the unemployment insurance programmes, employment and training programmes, support for post-secondary education, social assistance, social service, social development, labour standards and the distribution of work.

Many other countries are going through similar exercises to deal with the same types of problems, but as the Director-General notes in his Report, employment and labour issues can no longer be handled effectively at the national level alone. The question which this Conference has been asked to reflect upon is: What should be role of the ILO in this new context?

There is no doubt in my mind that the original ILO objective of promoting economic development which fosters social justice remains as valid today as it was in 1919.

By virtue of its universal membership and because of its unique tripartite structure, the ILO is well positioned to make a significant contribution to the search for more socially oriented patterns of economic growth and adjustment.

In my view, the challenge lies not in the ILO's objectives but in its means of action.

In his Report, the Director-General notes that the ILO cannot and should not try to do everything. He is seeking the views of the ILO constituency as to where the emphasis of the ILO's activities should be.

No one can dispute that the many Conventions adopted by the ILO over the years have had a real and positive effect on the improvement of working conditions throughout the world. No one can dispute the need for continued promotion of better implementation of standards. But as the Report points out, the rate of ratification of Conventions has been stagnating for a good number of years. There are many possible reasons for this. One of these may well be the growing difficulty of developing common rules which would be relevant for member States in very different circumstances, while meeting the concerns of both workers and employers.

In this context, the role of the ILO parallels that of national administrations and the challenge is similar: to transform principles into workable realities and to reconcile often divergent needs and interests into a coherent, sustainable and manageable fabric.

On the question of standard setting, the views of my delegation are in line with the position expressed by the Industrialized Market Economy Countries. Like the Director-General, we believe that the focus should be on quality rather than quantity. We believe also that the process of evaluation and revision of existing standards should be intensified, and we support the Director-General's proposal to reorient the General Surveys for this purpose.

Many aspects of economic and social policy now transcend national boundaries and do not lend themselves to the development of ILO Conventions. But the ILO is not only a standard-setting organization, it is also a forum for reflection and debate and a source of research, analysis and policy options.

We strongly support the Director-General's intention to reinvigorate the research programme of the ILO. In this complex and rapidly changing world, the availability of objective and wide-ranging research and analysis is, in my view, essential to shed light on complex problems and to distinguish between ideological arguments and empirical realities. It is needed to bring greater vigour and precision to international reflection and debate, to offer new perspectives and new insights, to challenge conventional wisdom and to stimulate better informed discussion at both the national and international levels.

I would indeed encourage ILO research on such issues as the impact of economic and financial policies on employment, the alleged conflict between the protection of workers and the promotion of employment, and the potential linkage between working time and the distribution of work.

I share the view of the Director-General that new ways should be found to better involve high-level national and international experts and policy makers in ILO debates, and I note with interest that the Director-General intends to submit proposals to the Governing Body in this regard.

The Report of the Director-General touches upon the highly topical questions of labour standards and international trade, an issue which is gaining increased attention worldwide. It has been raised in the GATT, it is being examined by the OECD, and it will no doubt be discussed by the Preparatory Committee of the new World Trade Organization.

The ILO cannot be absent from that debate. In fact, its unique mandate dictates that it be involved. However, I believe that adopting a declaration or a convention on this question would be premature. The very process would create the risk of sharpening the polarization of deeply divergent points of views.

What is needed at this time is a clearer conceptual framework: a dispassionate and objective analysis of the dimensions of the issue, of empirical evidence and possible options.

We must first assess the actual impact of labour standards on international trade and define what is meant by such terms as "labour standards". We must differentiate between exploitative conditions and legitimate comparative advantages. We must address existing concerns on the risk of reviving protectionism and articulate a plausible distinction between what constitutes basic rights, on the one hand, and standards made possible by progress in economic development on the other.

Many options could be put forward. One of these, not mentioned in the Director-General's Report, may well be the possibility of incentives for improved implementation of existing national legislation.

The purpose is to ensure that the economic benefits of trade liberalization bring about a corresponding improvement in the working and living conditions of workers throughout the world. As a universal and tripartite Organization, the ILO brings together the major players in the global economy. It is essential that the ILO be part of the international reflection on this question.

(Mr. Ould Sidi takes the Chair.)

Mr. BOATENG (Minister for Employment and Social Welfare, Ghana) – Allow me, on behalf of the Ghanaian delegation, to congratulate the President and the other Officers on their well-deserved election to chair this historic session of the International Labour Conference. My delegation has no doubt that with the impressive background and rich experience of the President we can but achieve a resounding success at this important Conference.

On the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO, the Government and people of Ghana wish to pay glowing tribute to the vision and determination of the founders of the Organization to protect and improve the conditions of working people, which had deteriorated as a result of the ravages of the First World War.

In spite of the tremendous achievements and successes chalked up by the ILO in promoting social justice in the world of work, the world today is engulfed by a social time-bomb, occasioned by the collapse of communism, ethnic wars and social strife, economic recession, the debt burden, unemployment, environmental degradation, AIDS and other social problems.

It is against this disturbing background that the ILO is celebrating its 75th anniversary, to assess its successes and failures in discharging its mandate to its unique tripartite constituents.

The theme chosen for this auspicious occasion by the Director-General in his Report entitled Defending values, promoting change. Social justice in a global economy: an ILO agenda is therefore apt and appropriate for this Conference. For, in our everyday lives, as well as in the social environment, there is great controversy surrounding the word "values". Therefore, if the debate on the theme of the Director-General's Report is to make any remarkable impact on the ILO agenda, then there is the need to establish whose values, and which values, we are defending, and when and how to revise, enrich, expand, question and protect those values.

We have every reason to be especially concerned about the future of the ILO, partly as a result of the persistent globalization of the economies of the world, as well as due to the decline of communism and the end of the Cold War. The crisis situation in the present world naturally affects the mission, activities and fundamental aspirations of the ILO.

There is the need therefore to analyse, evaluate, judge and decide on the problems, challenges, conflicts, options and opportunities the situation presents to the Organization.

In meeting this challenge the Director-General advocates the need to have greater confidence in active tripartism as a motivating force. While agreeing with the Director-General, I would however wish to stress the need to transcend dogmatic tripartism and recognize the active role of other relevant non-tripartite actors and stakeholders in the world of work. This position will naturally necessitate strengthening, reorienting and redefining the mandate of the ILO Secretariat so as to be able to face the tasks ahead.

In a world dominated by the forces of globalization of corporate activity and economies, privatization and democracy, we have very good reasons to question the values and policy orientations which should govern the relationship between labour standards and international trade so as to ensure that international competition is not distorted by the exploitation of workers.

For us in Africa the triumph of the market economy, fluctuating commodities prices and the spiralling debt burden have had very worrisome implications for the people and their institutions. Production in many countries has dropped dramatically, unemployment is worsening and the level of poverty deepening. Meanwhile, the debt burden is growing out of proportion to our gross national products.

The crisis which therefore faces Africa and other developing countries emphasizes the need to discuss existing practice and review the role of competition, employment generation, productivity, cooperation and networking at various levels if the ILO's core mission of contributing to universal and lasting peace through the promotion and development of social justice is to have any meaningful impact on the underprivileged and deprived peoples of the world.

This situation undoubtedly poses a great challenge to the ILO. We therefore agree with the Director-General that under the circumstances, a high level of modesty is called for in the discharge of the duties of the ILO. However, modesty alone is not enough. There is the need for foresight, flexibility and resourcefulness from all stakeholders within the ILO system.

We shall expect future ILO values to support and strengthen among others, its standard-setting and revision activities based on effective planning, field research, resource organization and appropriate interactions with relevant non-governmental organizations which ought to be consulted in such exercises.

With changing conditions at the global level, the ILO should regard itself as a forum for debate and a worldwide source of reference as a catalytic partner in technical cooperation and assistance. In pursuing this task, the ILO ought to define its new role and relations with institutions like the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the newly formed World Trade Organization among others, if it is to fulfil its responsibility of examining and considering all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of the fundamental objective of social justice, as assigned it, in part, by the Declaration of Philadelphia.

We in Ghana have abounding faith in the capacity of the ILO to overcome the scale and urgency of the problems that assail us today. We acknowledge and respect how the ILO, through its dedicated and tireless efforts in the past has been able to promote better working conditions, has combatted all forms of exploitation and championed the cause of working people to freely associate and bargain collectively for their rights.

Since becoming members of the ILO in 1958, Ghana has steadfastly upheld the fundamental principles of the Organization such as freedom of association, tripartism and social justice. The Constitution of the Fourth Republic of Ghana (1992), Chapter 12, guarantees fundamental freedoms, human and labour rights and ensures that our labour laws and regulations, and industrial relations practices are in consonance with relevant ILO Conventions and Recommendations, which Ghana has ratified.

Therefore, as we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO, I wish on behalf of the Ghanaian delegation to congratulate the Director-General and his staff for steering the Organization through these difficult times. I have no doubt in my mind that the ILO will rise to the new challenges that face it as has been aptly captured in the message of the Director-General, "Let us not reach for the moon. Rather let us examine together how we can improve the day-to-day life of our fellow beings in practice.

The task ahead is how do we as partners operationalize the message in our collective effort to attain greater social justice as we seek to promote change in relation to production, employment and fair distribution of the expected benefits of expanded trade and economic growth for the social partners in the future.

These, I believe, should be important items on the agenda of the ILO for the years to come.

Original Arabic: Mr. ABDUL-GHANI (representative, Palestine) – First may I congratulate the President on behalf of the delegation of Palestine and myself on his election at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. This is a momentous year during which we must try to involve all parties to production in taking up the most responsible posts at all levels. I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents and the chairmen of the committees on their election.

It is with very great pleasure and satisfaction that I am here before you, on behalf of the delegation of Palestine at this session of the Conference and as a representative of Palestinian workers to pass on to the International Labour Organization the best wishes of the Chairman of the PLO, Yassar Arafat, on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO, and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. We would also like to welcome the tripartite delegation of South Africa in the hope that Palestine will have its turn at the next session.

We have looked with great interest at the Director-General's Report, Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda. This is a Report marked by an in-depth analysis, valuable opinions, clarity of thought and a balanced vision of the future activities of the ILO, and the challenges it will have to face. It is beyond doubt that the efforts made to draw up this Report warrant our gratitude and appreciation. We share many of the views of the Director-General, nonetheless, it is necessary to strengthen the principles and priorities which affect our lives and which will determine our future. We, the Palestinian people, have struggled and continue to struggle to attain national independence so that the Palestinian nation may spring forth from ruins. We believe that the Gaza-Jericho agreement is the first step towards asserting our national identity, so that peace and social justice may be established in the region. Peace cannot prevail without the eradication of hunger, poverty, unemployment, and discrimination. As poverty and unemployment are widespread in the Gaza Strip and other Palestinian territories, we call on the International Labour Organization to assess employment policy throughout the world and draw up measures which could deal with this issue and keep the market economy under control. The Report rightly stresses that the Organization has been called upon to play an important role in the international arena alongside organizations dealing with the world economy, because the ILO, thanks to its tripartite constitution is in the best position to respond to questions raised with regard to the social aspects of new international trends.

The responsibilities our Organization must shoulder over the next century are enormous. For this reason we must prepare ourselves better to understand them, and respond to them at the same time as striving for economic and social development. We believe that the protection and promotion of human rights, especially trade union rights and democracy must be at the top of the ILO's list of priorities, in accordance with its Constitution, the Declaration of Philadelphia and the instruments adopted at its Conferences. For this reason also, there are no grounds for stating that the ILO's stance against racial discrimination in South Africa, and the situation of Palestinian workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories does not fall within its sphere of competence. Widespread injustice and poverty in a region pose a threat to all other regions. We can therefore not afford to ignore such phenomena any more than we can ignore injustice, discrimination, exploitation or occupation, not to mention food and economic blockades which are used as a political weapon, especially against the Iraqi workers and people, and which are a violation of fundamental human rights. Nor should we forget the crushing debt paralysing many countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

The once multipolar, then bipolar, world is now monopolar. Hence the economic changes which affect the world of work. It is time that the ILO took account of the balance which must be struck between the north and south.

We, the Palestinian people, profoundly wish to join the other nations of the world in the struggle for progress, against poverty and unemployment. We do not wish to continue to live off assistance programmes in the future, but we would like to thank all those who have helped us at this time.

I would especially like to thank the Director-General for the technical cooperation programmes launched at his initiative, our sister trade union organizations and the Arab Labour Organization, which have helped us to draw up Palestinian draft laws on labour and freedom of association in accordance with international standards and those of the Arab world.

Ms. O'ROURKE T.D. (Minister for Enterprise and Employment, Ireland) – Firstly, I wish to record my congratulations to the ILO on this, its 75th anniversary year. Based, as it is, on a unique system of voluntary Conventions, deriving from tripartite government, employer and union consensus, the peoples of our countries have good reason to be thankful for the work of the ILO since 1919.

I would very much wish to underscore the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne's comment in his Report that the best tribute to the ILO's 75 years of work is to ensure that its work continues fruitfully for the next 75 years. Therefore, I think the first step in responding to that challenge is to accept that it is now opportune to reassess both the ILO's aims and its operations.

Powerful, political, economic and technological changes have affected all of our countries to a greater or lesser extent over recent years. Their ultimate implications are as yet unknown. We have seen major political changes in Central and Eastern Europe. There is the ongoing emergence of a true global economy and of course the completion of a new GATT agreement at Marrakesh. Technological innovations have greatly altered employment patterns. If anything, the changes being generated by forces like these have yet to show their full effects.

Who, amongst us today, or indeed over the next few weeks, can say with any certainty what the achievement of a globalized economy will actually mean? We have expectations, people always have, nations always have, but much depends on how and where new opportunities are taken up and, for example, the extent to which our peoples respond positively to the forces of change. Theories and theorists abound but certainty is simply not possible.

Is the ILO – and I pose the question, because of course the question was also posed in the very fine Report by the Director-General, which we are all debating here today – in a position to deal with all these changes, these uncertainties? Perhaps not. Increasingly, governments' own abilities to respond are equally in question, as the Director-General's Report points out. Indeed, there is no one international body with the mandate and the functions to analyse the effects of political, social and economic change on a global scale and to act on its findings in the common interests of all.

We have equipped ourselves with various bodies. We have the ILO, the IMF and GATT, and soon now we will have the World Trade Organization (WTO), and each has its own mandate. If we needed those international agencies before, in a time of relative tranquillity, the momentous forces of change were unleashed, surely we need them now in a period of uncertainty.

The real issues facing us in this context are how and to what purpose to seek changes in bodies like the ILO, rather than whether we should do it or not. And I think that again was very clearly stated in the Report. It is not that we should stand still, and the ILO clearly recognizes that, but it is in what direction we should now go.

In Ireland and the European Union there is an ongoing debate on the necessary new approaches to employment creation, to competitiveness, to wealth creation and to social policy in general. I see every interest to encourage debate and reorientation of objectives and methods by the ILO.

I agree with the Director-General that the first requirement in such an exercise is to ensure, as he said in his own words, "a new consensus around a set of common values". These have to be shared by all. From these would flow any recasting required of objectives and methods. Whilst we must be careful to build on what exists and to avoid trying to change too much too quickly, equally, delay for any length of time would compound the challenge and would make it ever more difficult.

To reinforce the universal aims set forth in the Constitution of the ILO, to which we have all subscribed and, indeed, to augment its ability [illegible] influence debate on relevant issues, I want to focus on two practical suggestions.

Firstly, given the need for international bodies, as I said earlier and to which we all agreed, as for governments, to work together when circumstances require, I believe there is now a compelling case in this context for the Director-General of the ILO to liaise with the World Trade Organization in order to decide how the two organizations can best work together to pursue mutual objectives. There are clear links between global labour standards and global trade which need to be considered: competition based on legitimate comparative advantage is to be encouraged but trade advantage based on a sustained disregard for fundamental labour standards and rights is to be questioned.

A failure by the community of nations to recognize and to deal with these issues would, before long, be clearly seen as a serious mistake. A sound and stable global economy cannot be based for any length of time on the exploitation of the weak and the vulnerable. Failure to appreciate this would be indeed to build an edifice on a foundation of sand, an edifice, I put forward, that would not stand for very long.

The Director-General's Report points out that unilateral actions, just as protectionism, are to be avoided. While the concept of a "social clause" in international agreements ought not to be a taboo subject, I accept that there are suspicions and misapprehensions which have to be openly discussed, clarified and indeed put forward very clearly. Developing a workable multilateral approach which is clearly not based on protectionism will take time, but, above all, close cooperation between the ILO and the WTO. I consider that the effort will be worthwhile and that it should be made.

Secondly, now that trade and our economy is more global, it is less easy to accept the extent to which the ratification of ILO standards and, more importantly, their application should be as uneven around the world as it is. A truly level playing field in the arena of international trade and commerce which is now within the remit of WTO requires a new approach to standards by the ILO and all of its member States. In brief, we have to consider very seriously aiming for less detailed ILO standards but which target truly essential issues which would guarantee universal acceptance.

In my view, we need a set of universal realistic, attainable standards rather than a set of unevenly implemented but perhaps overambitious instruments. A new approach like this would also necessarily mean a far greater emphasis on supporting and ensuring consistent application by all ILO Members.

One important ingredient here would of course be that the new standards should be sufficiently generic to allow for the different forms and systems of domestic labour forces to find their way.

The view has been put forward in the past that the commitment involved in ratifying and implementing standards are luxuries to be afforded at a later date – and I know the comment by the Director- General to what he has heard of the argument that those are "rich societies in their splendid isolation". I make no direct judgements about that but the realities of an emerging global economy in a world where our countries are at widely differing stages of development mean that we must address approaches like this in an intelligent way. And there are just three options open to us.

I assume that we can all put to one side the option of a global economy with no regard of any kind for workers, peoples' rights and the environment. That is one option which we firmly put to one side. Alternatively, we can attempt to maintain the status quo, and I think we can also, in line with the Director-General's Report, put that to one side as well. Or, as I have suggested, we can aim for a new approach.

The status quo of an even ratification and implementation is, as the Director-General's Report rightly recognizes, now under pressure. The widely felt need to secure economic efficiency and competitiveness now requires an adaptable labour market.

There are other practical suggestions for change which time prevents me from addressing here such as the possible revision of older Conventions and others, as has been suggested by the Director-General, and I see no dichotomy or argument between a review of what has been implemented and the need to look at realistic Conventions attainable and set within the framework of a domestic economy in each country.

Maintaining and increasing employment is a crucial challenge here today and I am very glad that the ILO has taken on board the twin objectives of employment and raising people's living standards as its overall compelling task.

Summarizing briefly, there are major forces of change in the world which demand that to ensure a further 75 years of ILO success the Organization and its member States must be ready to take new approaches. I have said that the ILO should work closely with the WTO in coming up with a means of ensuring that certain basic standards are respected. Secondly, a new approach should be considered which, by espousing less detailed standards, we might expect in return that these would be universally ratified and implemented.

And, finally, could I quote from the conclusion of the Director-General's Report, in the concluding chapter in which he states: "But is it still possible to believe in social justice when the law of the strongest is not only imposed on so many men and women throughout the world but is now being regarded as a virtue in the context of generalized and rampant competition? Yet if we lose faith in that ideal, we shall be turning our backs on all the positive developments that the world has witnessed in recent years. ... History is in the making and the world is shedding another skin. It is a process that has always been painful, but one which we should try to hasten rather than slow down."

Original Spanish: Mr. SIFONTES (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, El Salvador) – I wish to express, on behalf of the Government of the Republic of El Salvador and on behalf of the delegation I am honoured to chair, my sincere congratulations to the President for his well-deserved distinction of election at this year's session of the Conference. This is, at the same time, also a due tribute to the Workers' group in this tripartite forum.

We would like to add to these congratulations the gratitude we feel towards the President for the concern he has taken in solving our problems and for the affection and sympathy he has always shown towards the people of El Salvador.

On this 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, we share in the joy that surrounds us and wish our Organization, the ILO, the greatest of success in its worthy endeavours to achieve permanent and lasting peace throughout the world by the promotion and development of social justice.

The Report submitted by the Director-General is a document of inestimable value in view of the topics it deals with, particularly in the first part which covers more specifically the Organization's future orientations, such as the preservation of existing values and the promotion of change whilst fully implementing social justice in a globalizing economy.

During this period of change and national reconstruction, the Report is well adapted to the historic times in which we are living in El Salvador. For us, the Report could be an excellent basis for a plan of action because it coincides with the views of the President of the Republic of El Salvador, Dr. Armando Calderon Sol, who, on the day he took over his high responsibility exactly a fortnight ago said "We are building a new El Salvador, a modern democratic and representative El Salvador. This requires legality, security, honesty, respect of human beings, solidarity and openness ... We shall undertake to encourage the growth of a harmonious society in which respect of human dignity will be the basic standard for coexistence among all Salvadorians. We want no more confrontation, much less polarization. We shall strive to achieve cooperation between all political and social forces in the pursuit of our great national project."

In my country, political pluralism obviously prevails. It is a fundamental factor in liberal ideology since political freedoms have no meaning unless they are matched by a diversity of opinions expressed by the political parties and social organizations. This liberal ideology views diversity of opinions to be an essential positive value and a fundamental good. It does not accept that one single opinion can hold absolute truth and that others are absolutely wrong. Liberal pluralism, which is now alive in El Salvador, naturally runs counter to the ideological dogmatism which caused so much harm and which never contributed to the democratization of our society.

We Salvadoreans, are all fully aware that times have changed in our country, and both those who govern and those who are governed must all strive to work in harmony within these changes.

In highlighting the concept of change, the Director-General has stated in his Report that "it was the economic failure of the system, rather than its moral bankruptcy, that led to the collapse of communism in Eastern Europe. The adoption of a market economy enjoyed widespread public support because it inspired hope for a better future and because it did not require the intervention of a discredited state apparatus ... Societies have been questioning their own values and policies ... Everywhere, or nearly so, the commitment to private enterprise is being reaffirmed ... The State is withdrawing from the economic sector, and privatization is taking place around the globe ... A planned economy no longer offers all the answers ... The market economy has become the universally accepted standard."

Within this context, we would like to emphasize that the Chapultepec Agreement signed in Mexico City on 16 January 1992 between the Government of El Salvador and the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front stipulates that, "the policy of privatization will foster social participation in property, promote worker access to privatized enterprise property, which will avoid monopolistic practices and will guarantee entrepreneurial freedom and protection of the consumer".

In El Salvador the move towards a liberalized, global and competitive economy, is now considered irreversible. The once-held concept of a protectionist and exaggeratedly interventionist State is now a thing of the past.

We are committed to achieving and maintaining strong, stable economic indicators, relatively developed capital markets, fiscal policies which foster price stability; and economic systems that promote open markets, but as our Head of State has pointed out, without losing sight of the fact that the economy should display a social function because its raison d'être is not wealth accumulation but wealth generation to improve the level and quality of life of all of its inhabitants. In other words, it must be a vector of the common good.

All this goes to show that El Salvador has the political will to bring about fundamental social and economic changes to solve the problems plaguing us, particularly unemployment. We are striving to create jobs for all Salvadoreans, but this means taking specific action both nationally and internationally. First and foremost, all the competent bodies and all employers' and workers' organizations (of all tendencies) must work together to prepare and implement concrete programmes and plans for developing our activities. There is no doubting that this will be of benefit to all. Second, we need businessmen and foreign firms to invest in our country and easy access to international markets for our products.

We consider, furthermore, that the benefits of trade and world economic growth should be shared with workers; we therefore feel that the social clause, which by its very nature is intended to protect workers' rights, should undergo in-depth analysis of scope and content.

I am happy to inform you that El Salvador recently introduced substantial reforms into its Labour Code, placing it on a par with the most advanced Codes in Latin America. The object of these changes was to bring our legislation into line with social and labour realities in our country and with certain fundamental ILO Conventions on human rights. We have adopted the principle of equal pay for work of equal value; we passed regulations on the minimum age of work, medical examinations for children, maternity protection and other matters of equal significance. Fundamental changes have also affected freedom of association; the most important here was to repeal clauses which hindered the setting up of agricultural trade unions and which were in contradiction of the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which guarantees to all workers the right of association without distinction and without prior authorization. In my country, there is no longer any difference between urban and rural trade unions. Any question of sanctioning trade unions is now a matter for the courts. Constituting a trade union has been simplified by instituting the principle of positive administrative non-contestation by which, if after 30 days following the submission of the relevant documents to the Ministry of Labour, the latter has made no statement, the trade union is considered registered by default and becomes a legal entity. Trade unions have been offered the possibility of adopting model articles of association to give them greater protection against anti-union discrimination and allowing trade unionists to occupy executive posts. As far as strikes are concerned, procedures have been simplified. Specific requirements have been laid down for the various phases of bargaining and administrative conciliation. With regard to regard to limitations on the right to strike, we have adopted the definition of "essential services" drawn up by the ILO supervisory bodies; the principle is now clearly stated that a strike is presumed legal provided no declaration has been made to the contrary and provided no other standards have been adopted which are more favourable to the workers and their organizations.

The legal reform instituted in our country has made it possible for us to ratify a number of the ILO Conventions: the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77), the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78), the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), the Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery (Agriculture) Convention, 1951 (No. 99), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No 111), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131), the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), the Rural Workers' Organizations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). All these Conventions are before our Legislative Assembly and will be ratified shortly.

It should be emphasized that the reform we have instituted in El Salvador provides for the setting-up of a Supreme Labour Council, a consultative body to institutionalize dialogue and promote economic and social concertation between the public authorities and employers' and workers' associations in full accord with Convention No. 144, which I have just mentioned, on tripartite consultation.

All these changes in El Salvador, and others which are taking place or planned, have benefited from ILO technical cooperation, and we would like to express our sincere gratitude for this. This collaboration endorses and bears witness to the Director-General's statement that the ILO's mission "is to help them to grow into States genuinely governed by the rule of law and able to guarantee basic human rights and the rights of the workers in particular".

To conclude on a note which is particularly gratifying for us. In El Salvador, as expressly enshrined in our Constitution, the rule of law in its strictest sense – justice, safety in the law and the common good – are subject to an even higher value – the value of the individual summoned to an eternal destiny.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-FAYEZ (Minister of Labour Affairs, Saudi Arabia) – In the name of God, most merciful and compassionate! It is a great pleasure for me, on my own behalf and on behalf of my delegation of Saudi Arabia, to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to preside over the deliberations of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that, thanks to God's will and to the profound wisdom and long experience of the President, the work of this Conference will be crowned with success.

I am also extremely pleased to welcome our brother country, Oman, as well as Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and South Africa to the ranks of the International Labour Organization.

It is most auspicious that this Conference is being held on the 75th anniversary of our Organization – one of the oldest international organizations. It is also fortunate that this anniversary coincides with far-reaching changes throughout the world and with the globalization of the economy; indeed, these are issues that the Director-General has addressed in his Report and they constitute a new challenge for our Organization in a rapidly changing world. The Organization will therefore have a difficult task before it in trying to take up these challenges: Defending values, promoting change.

The Director-General's choice of subject is therefore most timely and appropriate. We agree with him that the time has come to review the objectives and means of action of our Organization so that it and its bodies might be able to adapt better to the unceasing changes throughout the world; this is even more relevant today because our Organization now has 170 member States, of which most are in the developing world. The information and proposals contained in the Director-General's Report will stimulate dialogue and help us to find solutions – in full objectivity.

In our quest for noble social values and the respect of basic human rights, we need look no further than Islam which has always had these basic objectives. It advocates justice and bans injustice; it respects the inherent dignity of all human beings and refuses to accept any discrimination whatsoever on grounds of race, religion, sex or colour. The sharia (Islamic law) upholds human rights and believes in the right to justice and peace. These are not empty words; they constitute the basic teaching of the sharia towards which we all owe allegiance.

In spite of the fact that these noble principles apply to all, Islam insists on the rights of workers. They are protected by specific legal texts which regulate their relations with their employers and define their reciprocal rights.

God in his wisdom has allowed my country to be the guiding light of Islam and a homeland for the holy saints of Islam; it shelters "the old house" that God has given to human beings so that they might find comfort and security there. Saudi Arabia has adopted Islam as its religion; the sharia regulates its Constitution and influences its way of life. Saudi Arabia is therefore in a unique situation. It is bound to abide by the tenets and teachings of Islam. It gives an example to all its believers; its policies and Government are imbued with justice, dialogue, equality, security and prosperity – and all those living in Saudi Arabia enjoy these privileges. Are these not the fruit of social justice inherent in the religion of Islam?

We have been inspired by these noble values in the sharia when drafting our basic labour legislation. We have drafted this legislation in cooperation with the ILO and we have been guided to a great extent by the standards it has adopted. Consequently, our legislation places great emphasis on social justice, equality and the protection of workers and their interests. For instance, Saudi Arabia takes in workers of all nationalities who work side by side with our national citizens without being subjected to any discrimination. They are all equal before the law. They work in a system which encourages stability and avoids any conflict between the social partners.

And we owe all this to God's wisdom and to the fact that our Kingdom respects the sharia.

In his Report, the Director-General insists on the need to review the ILO's standard-setting activities. He proposes many changes to allow us to keep abreast of international developments. We believe that his ideas will open up new horizons for the ILO and allow us to obtain our noble objectives. We agree with his words but wish to state the following: first, there are tangible gaps between growth and levels of development. The situation in developing countries is vastly different from that in the developed countries. This must be taken into account when drafting international labour standards; those that may be applied by some countries cannot be applied by others. Second, the supervisory machinery and application of Conventions and Recommendations must be overhauled. A number of instruments may be interpreted in different ways; adopting a new text does not necessarily render the others invalid. We therefore propose that the supervisory bodies should limit their work to highlighting flagrant violations of Conventions and should not make comments based on an interpretation – which is not always unanimous. We believe it is important to introduce the notion of flexibility in the application of Conventions and to have more representatives from the developing countries, with varying cultures and outlooks, on the Committee of Experts. Third, the Organization may be proud of having adopted standards regulating various branches of activity; however, the drafting of standards should not be an end in itself. We must not lose sight of the fact that the true object of the exercise is to have these standards ratified. And most important of all, these standards must be implemented because then, and only then, will the Organization's objectives be attained. At worst, Conventions will just serve as a model. A great many Conventions have not been ratified and we must examine the reason why. Perhaps they are too rigid or too demanding? Perhaps their texts fail to take into account prevailing economic and social conditions or the technological possibilities of member States – especially those of developing countries. We must therefore re-examine closely all the Conventions and allow for partial ratification of some of their provisions, which would make them more flexible. Fourth, we must also lend our support to the Governing Body's programme to simplify the Organization's meetings – shortening them and concentrating on vital issues.

There are several important technical items on the agenda of this session: part-time work; safety and health in mines; and the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. We hope that our discussions on these items will lead to a fruitful conclusion.

Now that we are talking about social justice and human rights at this Conference, we cannot fail to mention the horrendous war in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the ethnic cleansing being practised by the Serbs. This is a shameful situation and contrary to he basic tenets of social justice. While an unarmed Muslim people are denied arms to defend themselves, some are providing the Serb aggressors with arms so that they might continue their war of genocide. We call upon the international community to ift the embargo on the supply of arms to the Repubic of Bosnia and Herzegovina so that it might defend tself. We ask it to assume its responsibilities and to ntervene to put an end to this war, to strengthen sanctions against the Serb aggressors and to isolate hem at the international level so they are forced to stop their aggression.

Finally, may God grant success to our Conference and may the peace, the mercy and the grace of God be with you.

Ms. ANDERSEN (Minister of Labour, Denmark) – On behalf of the Danish delegation I would like to congratulate the President on his election to the office of President of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish him every success in his important functions.

This year is a very special one for the ILO. A 75th anniversary surely calls for celebration. This occasion should be used to bring international attention to the Organization. Of course, we must also celebrate this event within the Organization. An occasion of this kind is not only for us to look back and reflect on results achieved. It should also make us consider plans and aspirations for the future. What role is the ILO going to play in the next century?

This is not at all easy in today's world with unemployment and social problems. The ILO must take up the challenge and do its job properly on the international scene.

The Director-General's Report to this Conference offers a good basis for discussion on the future of the ILO. The Danish delegation has expressed its support of the Director-General's efforts to give new life to ILO activities, especially the tripartite structure. The Danish Government continues to support such action. It has been a pleasure to study the Director-General's Report.

The development in the world over the last few years may lead to a new and important role for the ILO to play. I am here first of all thinking of the events that have occurred in Central and Eastern Europe; but also the general economic development which has paved the way for making economic conditions and working life ever more internationalized and globalized. The regulation of working life must therefore be truly international if it is to have any impact.

At this point, I would like to mention the standard-setting activities of the ILO. We should carefully consider the content of these standards. The quality and not the number of the Conventions to be adopted is what counts. The content of these Conventions should be of such a quality that many countries will adopt and ratify them. The goal is to ensure basic rights globally.

The Director-General says that this development may lead to a need for regulations in completely new areas. I quite agree. We should take up new fields of activity rather than going on with ever more detailed regulation in what we may call our traditional fields of competence. We do not have to adopt a new Convention each year. We could instead revise some of the old Conventions so that many more countries will ratify them. The number of countries having ratified the Conventions at present is far too low. To globalize standards we must simplify them.

The ILO should spend more resources on employment issues. Unemployment affects both the developing countries and industrialized ones. The ILO has a unique knowledge about working conditions all over the world. When it comes to employment policy, the ILO should make itself more visible and develop its cooperation with other international organizations.

This brings me to the question of social clauses in trade, a tricky subject. Some think that there is a conflict between employment promotion and social clauses. Some people fear that industrialized countries may use them for protectionist purposes. This is no excuse for the ILO to ignore the problem.

I believe that one problem is that we do not express our views on social clauses clearly enough. Maybe we should simply find another term. As I see it, social clauses are part of basic human rights, such as freedom of association and collective bargaining – as indeed are non-discrimination in employment and the elimination of forced labour and child labour.

For humanitarian reasons, though, it is vital that we address the enormous problems of child labour and the terrible exploitation of the labour force in certain countries. When we discuss basic rights, I am sure it will be very difficult to find any conflict between social clauses and a cut in unemployment.

The principles of basic rights are laid down in a number of ILO Conventions and are broadly accepted and ratified by many countries. I fully agree when the Director-General says that the ILO is required to participate actively in this debate.

Technical assistance is a central element of the ILO's activity. It is vital that the ILO continues to provide development assistance and support the establishment of tripartite systems. Not only the countries in Eastern and Central Europe, but also the developing countries all over the world, should benefit from this.

The Director-General has introduced the idea of "active partnership" to ensure the best possible use of the resources available. This has my wholehearted support. Partnership has become a keyword, because we are not just talking about cooperation between governments.

Sustainable assistance should be based on solid and forward-directed partnership between those who receive assistance and those who grant it, be it individual countries or international organizations, such as the ILO. The tripartite structure of the ILO puts it in a unique position to further the much needed understanding among non-governmental actors.

Let me round off by drawing your attention to my country. You know that the United Nations has decided to convene a World Summit for Social Development to be held in March next year in Copenhagen. We shall address such topics as poverty, productive employment, and social integration. All initiatives will rest on the basic idea of the responsibility of society in interaction with the responsibility, integrity and dignity of the individual.

The aim of the ILO is to improve social conditions for workers all over the world. The ILO has already done a great job and put forward highly valuable ideas for the preparation of the Social Summit.

Let me conclude where I started: the anniversary of an important international organization. In Denmark we are celebrating the ILO in several ways.

Original Spanish: Mr. CORRAL BORRERO (Minister for Labour and Human Resources, Ecuador) – A worker has been appointed to preside over this universal assembly. It is a matter of the utmost satisfaction that the International Labour Organization, in commemorating its 75th anniversary, is thus paying deserved tribute to all workers. In congratulating the President on his appointment, may I also express my keenest wishes that this great meeting will be a success.

I also wish to express my heartfelt congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, on the extremely important Report he has drawn up and placed before this assembly for consideration and debate. Such a document is of enormous significance and gives us a major opportunity by inviting us, and indeed warning us, to change, while at the same time maintaining immutable values. We are extremely pleased, as we share wholeheartedly the view that the tripartite structure should be retained and that there is a need to maintain and further deepen the philosophy, principles and objectives which gave rise to the ILO some 75 years ago to contribute to universal and permanent peace by promoting and developing of social justice. These are the immutable values which we should preserve: peace and justice. The path the ILO has chosen has made it possible to make steadfast progress; it crosses flourishing fields which have sprouted from universal social and labour standard setting and the effectiveness of technical advice and cooperation. But this path is incomplete. Much remains to be done. As we proceed, we must accept and understand a different world because of the changes which have taken place, including the fall of the Berlin Wall. The radical transformation of the political, commercial and technological environment in the world has effectively meant a more rapid globalization of economies and greater interdependence and competitiveness of markets for goods and services. Countries are seeking desperately to overcome this crisis and have geared their actions to achieving technical progress and economic growth as a premise for job creation and the reduction of poverty. The Report recalls the absolute priority which all countries must give to the creation of productive jobs in order to tackle the tragic and explosive reality of 30 per cent of the world's labour being deprived of productive employment, more than 120 million people being unemployed and around 700 million underemployed.

To give a fresh impetus to job-creating economic growth, it is necessary to overcome obstacles to national and foreign private investment; to remove certain economic activities from the State and assign them to the private sector, to soften the rigidity of supposed social protection standards; to reconcile the rights and obligations of workers and employers, and to remember, as the Report says, that labour legislation is not enough unless every person has the opportunity to find employment.

Scarcely a year ago I had the honour and opportunity in this same forum to report and comment on the fact that the Government in my country, Ecuador, under our President, Sixto Durán Ballén, had undertaken a process of transformation and change, and had agreed to a socially balanced macroeconomic stabilization plan. I can say today that this process has already begun to bear fruit. Inflation has fallen by 50 per cent, from 60 per cent in 1992 to 30 per cent in 1993, and we hope to reduce it to 20 per cent this year and to continue still further. We have substantially reduced the deficit, and interest rates have fallen. There has been a stabilization of the exchange rate and a substantial bolstering of our foreign currency reserves. Major social actions have been developed in the areas of education, health, housing, infrastructure, roads and grass-roots training.

The Government has also begun modernizing the State with the aim of streamlining the administration and making it more efficient. It has begun decentralizing, localizing and simplifying activities, breaking up monopolies on the production of goods and services, and delegating some public services and economic activities to the private sector, seeking to make them more efficient and also seeking resources for social programmes. Such a process will be socially equitable. It will not violate the rights of the workers, who have been invited to take part in the process. The reduction of the size of the State and the revival of the State which are based on the reduction of jobs in the public service and also involves the payment of compensation which can be used for productive job-creating activities.

In the social and labour field, may I highlight two important phenomena.

Firstly, the purchasing power of wages is on the rise, reversing more than a decade of wage erosion. We have done this by periodically increasing wages faster than inflation, thus bringing about an increase of some 14 per cent in the real wages of the lowest paid Ecuadorian workers. This has been acknowledged by ILO and United Nations experts. It has made it possible for us to view with optimism the aim of arriving in the medium term at a fair wage which would satisfy personal and family requirements. The present level of wages is not sufficient to meet these requirements even when all the currently compulsory payments have been included.

Secondly, I would like to mention that we are implementing a policy of harmony and equity in employer and worker relations. There is a need for the role of capital in society to complement labour as inseparable creators of collective wealth. As labour conflicts become ever more rare thanks to important cooperation between employers and workers, the social peace and civilized labour relations so conducive to development can take hold.

We know that the Government alone cannot meet these aims of bringing about an improvement in the well-being of the Ecuadorian people. For that reason we have invited the productive forces, employers and workers, to participate in a social dialogue to arrive at a major national tripartite agreement with a view to achieving sustained economic growth with social equity capable of generating employment, improving living conditions and consequently reducing poverty.

May I, from this high rostrum dedicated to pluralism, pay tribute and express my admiration to the International Labour Organization on the occasion of its 75th anniversary of unswerving commitment to universal peace and social justice. Indeed, to mark this event, the Government of Ecuador will issue in the next few days a special commemorative postal stamp, and additionally it has published, with the help of the Ecuadorian Social Security Institute, a compilation of international labour Conventions ratified by our country. I am giving the President and Officers a copy of this publication, and I would like to reiterate the will of the Government of Ecuador to back initiatives which, in accordance with the principles and objectives of this Organization, seek to establish a more just and humane world community.

May the World Summit for Social Development next year allow the ILO to play the leading role incumbent upon it. I also would like to welcome the new dawn in South Africa, the delegation of which is with us today.

Original French: Mr. NIDELCU (Minister of Labour, Social Protection and Family, Republic of Moldova) – I would like on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Moldova to present cordial and respectful greetings to all those who are participating in the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I take great pleasure in congratulating you on the occasion of a two-fold anniversary – the ILO's 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia – and to offer our sincerest good wishes for complete success in all activities.

I am convinced that the Conference debates and the documents to be adopted will make a significant contribution to the fulfilment of the mandate of the Organization and that they will promote the new approaches and means of action to be taken in order to guarantee human rights and to promote social progress in the world. The delegation of the Republic of Moldova is ready to contribute in an active manner to the work of the Conference. This participation will be very useful to us at our national level.

Moldova, like all the other Members of the Organization, is currently celebrating these two important dates. The two years since our Republic became a Member of the Organization, is too short a period to be able to draw major conclusions concerning these two important dates. However, during this period the International Labour Office on the one hand, and the Republic of Moldova on the other, have undertaken a series of activities in order to speed up the integration of our country in the sphere of activity of the ILO so as to achieve results.

Experts from several international bodies have visited our Republic. They have analysed our legislation and studied the situation on the labour market. They have analysed the situation of the labour market. They have studied the problems of social protection of the more vulnerable categories of the population and considered other issues at the national level. As a result, a series of recommendations have been formulated which have made it possible to improve the structure and the major thrusts for development of the social infrastructure, to expand the legislative framework and to adapt it to international standards, and to implement fully the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO with a view to resolving the different problems.

With the help of the International Labour Office, we have been given direct technical and practical assistance. My country has participated in the meetings of the labour ministers of European countries and in other international meetings, which has enabled us to broaden our horizons and to acquire invaluable experience as well as to strengthen our cooperative relationship with the ILO.

The Government of the Republic of Moldova is well aware of the role played by the Community and supports its policies intended to resolve problems at the national level arising in the field of employment and social protection. We hope that cooperation between Moldova and the ILO will expand and will become more intensive in the future.

As regards the Governing Body's resolution on the commemoration of the two-fold anniversary of the ILO, our country has undertaken to implement it, to the extent of its possibilities and the situation in our country.

Our Government has decided to create a tripartite committee in order to prepare for the celebration of these two important ILO dates. We have elaborated a plan of activities with all the means for its realization.

Nearly 40 Conventions of the ILO aimed at improving human rights and social justice have been presented to the new Parliament for ratification.

Practical activities in the field of labour and social protection are based on two major concerns: first, the elaboration of machinery for social security for the people and secondly, the adapting of legislation and national practice to international standards.

We should mention that during recent years every standard-setting act has been elaborated in accordance with ILO requirements; some of them have been submitted to the expert analysis of the ILO. Among these acts I would like to highlight laws on wages, migration, retirement and social protection, manpower utilization, individual and collective labour disputes and safety at work, among others.

Among the many problems which Moldova is confronted with at the present time I would like to mention inflation and unemployment. They painfully affect the well-being of the people.

Inflation has eroded the real income of the people, which lowers its standard of living. One measure to solve these problems, as we see it, is to develop a series of efficient actions by stimulating the entrepreneurial spirit in the private sector of the economy.

Unemployment is on the increase. The authorities of my Government have undertaken measures to prevent mass unemployment. In this connection, it would be very helpful to us if the ILO were to give us its assistance based on its wealth of experience.

In his Report, Defending values, promoting change, the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, has put forward new proposals for measures to increase the effectiveness of the activities of the ILO to promote democracy, human rights and social justice.

We realize that under conditions of change in an economy which is becoming globalized the ILO should considerably expand its activities in the political area as well and choose the right approach and the most effective means in order to solve the host of accumulated problems and to overcome the difficulties. This is why our delegation attaches great importance to the proposal that the ILO should undertake a greater and more intense activity in the field of international politics.

The expansion of the Organization's activities in this area would enhance its position. The 81st Session of the International Labour Conference shows once more the attachment of this Organization to the ideals of democracy and social progress. We would like to express the Republic of Moldova's endorsement of these ideals. My country will make an active and constructive contribution, which is indispensable to the implementation of the measures adopted by the Conference.

Ms. SIMPSON (Minister of Labour and Welfare, Jamaica) – Let me on behalf of the Government of Jamaica and the delegation that I lead extend to Mr. Gray heartiest congratulations on his election to chair the proceedings of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that success will attend all his endeavours throughout these deliberations.

My delegation to this Conference in particular salutes the International Labour Organization on the milestone of its 75th anniversary. When we assess the record of the ILO for the past 75 years, we remain convinced that those years have been of highly successful collective engagement. We remain impressed also by the demonstration of the organizational pedigree of the ILO. Indeed, the ILO's adaptive style, commitment to its mission and its determination to make itself relevant, command the respect and admiration of all member nations of this body.

It is because of this that we are excited by the decision of the ILO to use the occasion of this 75th anniversary to turn deliberately to the future and to ponder the responsibilities to be assigned tomorrow. We are excited, jubilant even, at the new ray of sunlight and hope that has descended over South Africa as a result of the recent all-race election which propelled Nelson Mandela from prisoner to President of one of Africa's most promising nations. We welcome back South Africa into the ILO and the family of nations. Almost every aspect of the global community will be better from here on for the inclusion and participation of post-apartheid South Africa, as the world community searches for new designs of the management of its responsibilities on the basis of tolerance, cooperation and reconciliation.

One of the insights to be gleaned from the recent South African experience is how powerful a force globalization really is. It is a force that is continuously gathering momentum and none of this should be lost on the ILO, for with that movement has come the growing integration and interdependence of the world community. The globalization process has also given rise to regional structures and trading blocs. Of course, globalization has given a new status to market economies, and market economies have meant more intense competition in the domestic and international environment.

Furthermore, trade liberalization and expansion have stimulated the movement of labour, capital and technology. By themselves, these developments carry powerful implications for the less developed countries. And for a State such as Jamaica, where the globalization process has been accompanied by structural adjustment policy regimes, the business of public management has become most challenging.

To be sure, we in Jamaica understand the logic which expected that the policy measures of structural adjustment would promote economic growth, in addition to improving competitive advantage, encourage more efficient allocation of resources and, in short, remove many of the bottlenecks to national development.

But if the truth be told, we badly underestimated the extent of the mix of results. How was this possible?

The simple fact is that even as we experience a measure of economic growth and try new approaches to policy management, we in Jamaica have also come to experience new crises in unemployment, much social dislocation and uncertainty and declining standards of living for many. The macro-picture is one where we have experienced some loss of vitality in the collective approach to poverty alleviation and in the promotion and defence of social justice.

Fortunately, under these circumstances the Jamaican response has been partly informed by certain ILO frameworks and policy precedents. We have, for example, drawn on the helpful framework offered by the ILO to build and consolidate a viable tripartite constituency in Jamaica. On the basis of this framework, our social partners have been exercising a healthy respect for the fundamental labour relations standards set by the ILO which have aided domestic production and problem-solving.

We have also engendered some home-grown responses to the challenges of globalization and structural adjustment. Very briefly, we have broadened economic stakeholding and we are gradually transforming our industrial relations culture. Yet none of this will have much long-term relevance if we do not redouble our efforts to tackle the problem of poverty. And in this regard, I endorse wholeheartedly the sentiments expressed by the Director-General in his Report and I quote: "Poverty and unemployment are endemic to our planet and no one country can claim to be immune to the disease, just as no single country can ever hope to resolve the problem on its own." The "disease" of poverty is like a time bomb ticking away. One never quite knows when it is going to explode, but we all have a duty to avoid the explosion.

In this regard, my delegation wishes to issue a strong challenge to the international community as represented here today as to how we can avoid the poverty explosion. The strategy of poverty alleviation cannot include only some members of the disadvantaged and dispossessed community and not others. It has to include the entire constituency of the poor: women, ethnic minorities, the disabled, the young, the old and the work-shy.

The second aspect to this challenge regards the idea that government must lead this poverty alleviation initiative. Public policy must help to accomplish this objective. You see, the free market left to itself will not guarantee the health, education, social equality and freedom that we all value. The free market left to itself cannot transform broken human spirits in broken physical communities. The free market left to itself cannot rekindle the spirit of hope and a stake in the future lives of the millions around the globe for whom the cold ground will be their bed tonight. The free market left to itself certainly cannot guarantee for all of us the redemptive ethic that we all seek. Only a public policy, driven by government and biased towards growth more beneficial to the reduction of inequality, can guarantee us a future of peace.

While we recognize that the old ILO agenda is still unfinished, the struggle for social justice and poverty alleviation must continue. We recognize, too, that democratic values still have other barriers to break down. They still have other constituencies to penetrate. They still have many rivers to cross.

This is why my delegation would urge this Conference to lead the way towards rethinking many aspects of some of the prevailing development strategies, especially those dealing with poverty alleviation.

We also urge the design of new institutional frameworks and policies which are capable of sustaining more viable development partnerships in the international community – the type of development partnerships that deliberately marry economic imperatives with social objectives, like poverty reduction.

The agenda for the future cannot therefore ignore the need for further institutional strengthening of the ILO itself. The new agenda must find innovative ways to deepen our focus on ethical values such as mutual respect and caring; values which often guarantee social consensus and a stable climate of expectation. In all of this, the future can only be reasonably anticipated and managed if individuals and organizations think long-term rather than short-term; if we begin to concentrate on the prevention of socio-economic problems, rather than on their cure.

In closing, let me share with you the words of a distinguished Jamaican poet, H.D. Carberry, who wrote: "There shall come a time when these children in rags who litter the streets, who know the crushing mastery of poverty and the curses of dirt and slovenliness, shall walk with heads erect, proud owners of a new world, masters of themselves, admitting no inequality, feeling no inferiority, only a great humility and wonder for the destiny that shall be theirs".

We all have a role to play in ensuring a "new world" for the poor and disadvantaged. The future can be bright if the collective will is in place to tackle this struggle for change. We can, we will, we must.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL DHOBEE (Government delegate, Yemen) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. May I be allowed first of all to submit, on behalf of the delegation of Yemen, our most sincere congratulations to the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to lead the work of our Conference. We wish them every success and assure them that our delegation is at their entire disposal to ensure that this session is crowned with success.

We are also happy to welcome the Sultanate of Oman and the Republic of South Africa, as well as the other countries which have recently joined our Organization.

It is with pleasure that we are celebrating today, with the entire world, the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization which, since its inception, has aimed to establish lasting world peace based on social justice, which is the very essence of civilized man, and which the Organization would like to prevail throughout the world for the benefit of all workers. This is a form of social justice based on the respect of human rights, the guarantee of a worthy life for all, the guarantee of humane working conditions, the creation of jobs and the achievement of economic security and social peace. The unique tripartite structure of the Organization, and the reasoned and constructive dialogue of practices, have enabled this Organization to deal efficiently with the complicated problems facing the labour world. The very existence of our Organization has turned out to be an economic and social necessity.

On the basis of the objectives set forth in its Constitution and the guidelines of the Conference and the Governing Body, our Organization has been able, with the human and financial resources available to it and in the light of the changes and challenges it has had to face, to achieve considerable results in the last 75 years for its three constituent parties.

We are very grateful to the ILO, and mainly this is due to the values, the objectives and the noble human principles which it enshrines to its permanent struggle against discrimination and differences in treatment, to its efforts aimed at setting up an international community based on social justice, and working for the peace to which all of humanity aspires. During its work our Organization has been able to acquire the necessary ability and experience to respond to the ever-changing needs of its Members. On the basis of an objective evaluation of the Organization as an instrument of progress, and of its achievements, we are convinced that it will be able to fulfil its new tasks, resulting from the changes currently affecting the world.

It is with interest that we have studied the Report of the Director-General of the ILO. Although we are aware of the new realities in international relations, we feel nevertheless that these changes, because of their complex nature and the speed at which they are taking place, engender problems whose full scope it is difficult to assess at this stage. We are referring to the consequences of the globalization of the economy, the liberalization of trade and the worsening of social problems due to the move towards a market economy. It is therefore indispensable to modernise working methods and thought processes in order to find appropriate solutions to all these problems. In this respect, the Republic of Yemen hopes to be able to benefit from the experience of the international community, in particular in the fields of labour and human resources development. We feel that the International Labour Organization will be able to give us this assistance thanks to the experience and know-how it has acquired over its 75 years of existence.

Also, we must bear in mind the specific nature of the situation of the developing countries which are attempting to move to market economies. We must not forget that the legislations of these countries do not always tally with those of the developed countries, particularly when we look at the solutions proposed by the Director-General to guarantee respect for international labour standards. Indeed, the developing countries are attempting to achieve economic and social development, to move towards a market economy and to achieve economic and social restructuring, and during these processes they are encountering enormous difficulties. These countries need the help of all the international organizations in order to assume their responsibilities. In this connection, it is not fair to put on an equal footing countries with different levels of development and different abilities and to compare them to other countries, be they developed or developing, as regards the application of standards. This is contradictory to the principle of justice proclaimed by this Organization. Thus we request the adoption of the principle of a progressive application of standards on the basis of the economic and social development of each country.

All the developed countries and all international organizations should help the developing countries to overcome those obstacles preventing them from achieving progress, by affording these countries the means and capital to rebuild their economic and social structure, by lightening their debt burden and by ensuring the transfer of technology to these countries in order to whittle down the gap separating the developed and the developing countries, particularly as the latter have had to bear the full brunt of all economic and social development efforts.

The achievements of the Republic of Yemen in the field of labour have gone hand in hand with the strengthening of our country's ties with the ILO since our country became a Member of the Organization and since it adopted its first labour code with the help and advice of the Office. Our country has ratified and applied 22 Conventions concerning fundamental rights. We are now revising our labour legislation with the ILO's help so that it takes into account the current economic and social changes and our international commitments. Our country is preparing to celebrate the 75th anniversary of the Organization by issuing a commemorative stamp, and by organizing two seminars on the Organization, its activities and its fields of cooperation with Yemen. It is also going to broadcast television programmes which will emphasize and demonstrate the role, objectives and methods of this Organization. Here we would like to thank the ILO's regional office for the Arab States for the cooperation and help it has afforded us in overcoming difficulties in various fields. We hope to strengthen our links with the Office in the future.

We are pleased to note that since Mr. Hansenne became Director-General the Organization has revised its action, which has enabled it to face the present changes. I would therefore like to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on the successes achieved in the last few years.

In the light of the changes which have taken place on the international scene, we are still more convinced that the ILO now more than ever must play its role of pioneer and find solutions to the problems caused by these changes, and particularly with respect to social development and questions pertaining to labour, workers and human rights. The International Labour Organization, because of the humanitarian principles to which it is committed and its moral authority, is in the best position to deal with the social aspects of the problems we must face at the international level. We invite all the bodies of the ILO to be the conscience of the world as the market economy and liberalization are given free rein at the expense of basic human rights, and in particular at the expense of the right to work, to training and to social protection.

The triumph of democracy and equality in South Africa is the reward of our Organization's efforts to see the law prevail. Similarly, the return of the Palestinian people to part of its land in Gaza and Jericho is a first step towards the total liberation of Palestinian territory and its capital Jerusalem under the leadership of its only legitimate leader, the Palestine Liberation Organization.

At a time when the principles of justice and equality are prevailing, the world community is continuing stubbornly to subject the children, the elderly and the women of Iraq to additional suffering through the embargo which has been unjustly imposed upon its people. And this is the case despite the fact that Iraq has satisfied all of the demands of the United Nations. We also note that the embargo against the Libyan people is still in place despite the progress achieved in the so-called Lockerbie affair.

We urge all peace-loving peoples and countries to support the Iraqi and Libyan peoples with a view to lifting these embargoes so that they may achieve their objectives of growth and prosperity.

As you know, Yemen achieved unity in a climate of freedom and by virtue of a free decision of the people and the authorities in 1991. A referendum on the Constitution was organized in that year. Free and democratic elections took place on the basis of multipartism in 1993, and this was welcomed by all the Arab countries. Yemen then became a member of various international organizations, including the United Nations and, in particular, the ILO. Each Yemeni family is an integral part of the nation's social fabric, which cannot be torn apart. We consider that the Yemeni union is a factor of stability in the region. This was confirmed by the attitude of the Arab and international communities, and particularly in resolution 924 of the Security Council of the United Nations. The Yemeni people is a single peace-loving people, and is one of the peoples which have suffered most from underdevelopment. It therefore rejects any attempt of rebellion against the Government. All Yemeni citizens fervently desire an end to the war.

In conclusion, we wish the ILO full success in its endeavours with a view to achieving its major goal, namely, peace throughout the world, which can only be achieved on the basis of social justice.

Mr. TSUJINO (Employers' delegate, Japan) – This year, the Director-General's report is entitled Defending values, promoting change. It focuses on the kinds of activities the ILO should embark on in the future; and, looking back over past experience, it provides many pointers for the future. I congratulate the Director-General for having worked so hard to produce this document.

Vast political, economic and social changes have taken place since the ILO's founding in 1919. The ILO has responded to these changes and continued its efforts to fulfil its mission.

On the occasion of its 75th anniversary, it is of great importance for the ILO to reflect on what it has accomplished so far, and to identify the issues and determine what areas it should focus on in the future and what its course should be from now on.

I would like to mention three points which I believe are especially important. The first is that economic growth and development are essential for improving peoples' living conditions according to the ILO ideal.

Economic growth and development are of prime importance, and without expansion of employment and rising income it will be difficult to achieve the ILO's principal aims of respect for human rights and the eradication of poverty.

The importance of expanding employment through economic growth is evident, as the world economy suffers from recession today, and growing unemployment is a serious problem.

Creating wealth through appropriate corporate management and through development is the basic foundation for improving living conditions for all. To accomplish this, individual countries must make maximum efforts to help themselves; that is, there must be cooperation between labour and management. The ILO should promote the most appropriate and effective technical cooperation projects for dealing with the individual problems of various countries. I hope that the policy of active partnership and the network of multidisciplinary teams, established by the initiative of the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, will gradually achieve results.

One of the things that I have felt especially strongly about since becoming a member of the ILO's Governing Body and participating in ILO activities, is the importance of technical cooperation. It is vitally important that technical cooperation should change and improve the way of thinking of the peoples of recipient countries. Technical cooperation does not merely imply a transfer of tangible assistance, such as technology, financial aid, and so on. Its role is to change basic attitudes. If this is achieved, the developmental efforts of the recipient countries will be stimulated. I believe this is the main reason for making technical cooperation more viable and effective.

The second point is that globalization of the economy and the complex and diverse international relations make it important for international organizations to cooperate positively with each other.

In particular, developing countries requiring structural adjustment and countries which have recently shifted to market economies need the support of not only the ILO but also of the World Bank, the IMF and other monetary institutions.

What I would like to say here is that the various international organizations should shed notions of territory and establish true cooperative relations.

I think that Mr. Hansenne's positive stance in cooperating with other international organizations deserves to be mentioned here.

The third point I wish to go into is that the establishment of future international labour Conventions should be kept to a minimum.

Looking back, the position of the world's workers, and the conditions they work in, have changed almost indescribably, compared to 75 years ago. This has come about as a result of the ILO's activities, which are based on the fundamental principle of respect for human rights.

Today, international labour standards cover most major occupational situations. Without the ILO, these conditions would not have improved as much as they have today, even after 75 years.

In that sense, the ILO has carried out its primary role of establishing labour standards fairly, with the understanding and cooperation of its member States, and with a tripartite constituency of government, labour and management. I believe that this has been one of the most progressive and meaningful accomplishments in the history of the human race. The ILO has made a major contribution to the happiness of humankind.

However, reflecting on recent cases of establishment of international labour standards, the fact is that very few countries ratify the Conventions. Perhaps the Conventions are difficult to ratify because they lack flexibility; but the truth seems to be that some of them are not really needed by the member States or the world.

This means that, realistically speaking, technical cooperation is more effective in expanding employment and improving living conditions. Therefore, the ILO should keep standard setting to a minimum and devote much more attention to its other important role of technical cooperation. Enormous amounts of energy and funds are poured into formulating Conventions and Recommendations, which should be devoted instead to more extensive technical cooperation.

The ILO's Conventions and Recommendations have, as I mentioned, made an enormous contribution to improving working conditions throughout the world. But, simply setting labour standards does little to actually improve living conditions. Technical cooperation is necessary to help countries, especially developing countries, remedy their political, economic and social problems.

There is no doubt that it is by promoting technical cooperation that the labour standards the ILO has worked so hard to establish can truly be effective.

In closing, I would like to comment on the proposal made by the Director-General in Chapter 5 of his Report, that the Governing Body should hold high-level sittings at its March Session every two years, where governments would be represented at the ministerial level, to discuss the world employment situation and the main trends in the world economy which affect this.

I wonder just how well the government ministers, who would attend such a sitting, are really informed of the objectives and diverse activities of the ILO. However, there is no harm in trying and future actions can be decided depending on the outcome of such meetings.

However, I have a slight doubt about his second proposal – that the examination of employment and living standards should be made a standing item on the agenda at the International Labour Conferences. The Director-General believes that the aim of the discussion should be to produce something in between a formal standard (Convention or Recommendation) and a general exchange of views should be adopted. I believe that this is an issue which should be brought to the Governing Body first, before suddenly being proposed at the Conference.

Mr. ATASAYAR (Employers' delegate, Turkey) – I have great pleasure in extending to you all personally, and on behalf of the delegation of Turkish employers, my best wishes for a very successful session. I would also like to take this occasion to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the International Labour Conference.

This year we have an extraordinary event to celebrate at this session of the Conference. The International Labour Organization is 75 years' old, and we have every reason to be jubilant about this most significant anniversary which makes the ILO one of the oldest international organizations in the world. Such an event cannot, and in fact should not, go unnoticed. We must all strive to increase the world public opinion's awareness of the ILO and its activities.

In our opinion, if an international organization can survive for 75 years in a turbulent world dominated by wars, hostilities, economic and social imbalances, this shows, first and foremost, the soundness of the principles upon which it was founded. But it also creates a constant challenge and need for revision, change, adaption and self-criticism in rapidly changing circumstances. Therefore, it we want to see our organizations celebrate its 100th birthday and go beyond in full health, we should start discussing the perspectives of the ILO. As the Director-General correctly points out when concluding his Report, Defending values, promoting change, "The future of the International Labour Organization is not primarily a question of ways and means but of ethical considerations". We must build upon this basic premise.

The International Labour Organization was set up to contribute to world peace by promoting social justice. The question that we should all also ask ourselves today is whether it should continue to do so, or should we, under changing circumstances, add other goals that will be compatible with economic realities and will contribute to the creation of an international atmosphere within which social justice can better and more effectively be promoted. We believe as Turkish employers that, during this session of the Conference, this should be the central issue upon which views should be expressed. We have no doubt that these views will be assessed by ILO experts and be the agenda items of forthcoming sessions of the Conference.

There is no doubt that social justice is a fascinating concept to which we must all adhere.

But how can we arrive at a clear-cut working definition of social justice in a world of dramatic change? The world we live in today is characterized by such trends as the emphasis on market economy and democracy, the globalization of the economy, economic divergencies and the proliferation of social problems like unemployment. Can we define social justice in such a world without resorting to diverging value judgements? For instance, can we base the social justice concept on identical value judgements in two countries, the one with almost full employment, low inflation and a negligible informal sector, and the other with 20 per cent unemployment and a very large informal sector? Is social justice the same thing in two countries, the one with a very high rate of inflation and the other with economic stability?

As Turkish employers, we firmly believe that social justice can best be promoted through economic development and stability. To achieve this countries should aim at creating a propitious atmosphere through promoting democracy and the market economy. We are convinced that social regulations which are not commensurate with the economic capacities of countries result in social frustration rather than justice. In this connection, I would like to draw your attention to certain facts which need to be taken into consideration when discussing the future stance and policies of the ILO.

The changing world order and emerging economic concepts which pave the way for globalization require that the ILO pursue creative and innovative policies rather than continuing its conservative approach that offers excessive protection to employees.

The ILO's time-honoured redistributive considerations should be reinforced by considerations of production and employment. Without paying due attention to production, social justice can never be fully achieved.

The ILO should base its policies on promoting economic well-being rather than protecting labour alone.

Consequently, the progress of labour legislation should be sought within the specific conditions of each country and the ILO should refrain from influencing these conditions in approaches that run counter to economic realities, that is to say that promoting flexibility in labour legislation should be included among the ILO's new targets.

Obviously, these views reflect the need which we feel in my country today. They are also problems created by rapidly changing domestic as well as international conditions.

Experience has amply shown us that trying to achieve social justice per se without at the same time paying due attention to economic development is an effort doomed to failure. Therefore, the two objectives should be pursued in a balanced setting of values. Otherwise, one may end up in a situation where a small minority of working men and women enjoy all rights and benefits at the expense of great masses of unemployed and deprived people. This is clearly social injustice.

Therefore, as the Turkish Employers' delegation, we would like to see the ILO's fundamental objective of social justice backed and complemented by such equally important economic objectives as growth and employment.

Otherwise, social justice will remain deprived of substance as it has for years in most countries.

Hoping that the resolutions of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference will provide the ILO with better and wider perspectives than the perennial but rather fuzzy concept of social justice, I reiterate, on behalf of my delegation, my best wishes for a very successful session.

Mr. YANKANA (Employers' delegate, Guyana) – It is a great pleasure for me to speak again at the International Labour Conference, in particular at this 81st Session, which coincides with the 75th anniversary of the Organization. It is also a great pleasure for me to extend to the President the heartiest congratulations of the employers of Guyana on his election at this session of this International Labour Conference and the election of his supporting officers, the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Presidents.

I am here as part of a tripartite delegation from our country, Guyana, in which there are representatives of labour, a government minister and an official from the Ministry of Labour.

I would like to congratulate the Director-General for his very comprehensive review of the objectives of social justice as contained in his Report to this session entitled Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda.

The fact that our delegation is present here within the framework of a tripartite mechanism is essentially a commitment to the thrust of this august body to secure social justice while respecting the rights of the social partners, and doing so within a legislative system. The Director-General picks up on the changes which have occurred throughout many parts of the world preceding this Conference. Perhaps the most remembered event would be the achievement of democracy through transparent elections in South Africa which returned Nelson Mandela as President. President Mandela presented his case for democracy before this assembly as he had done on several occasions before. But democracy in South Africa will not be remembered without recognizing the role that this Organization has played in keeping the South African question in focus, year after year, as the apartheid issue remained on the agenda of the Conference.

Democracy is moving at the same time as the private sector is designated the "engine of growth", and the performance of the market economy has become the driving force behind movements for freedom in many nation States, even where there was only subdued violation of human rights posing in the skin of democracy, but as the Director-General pointed out, history is in the making, and the world is shedding another skin. As in nature, for nation states, this has also been a very painful exercise.

My early reference to tripartism was deliberate to allow me to mention now and speak of a welcome change that has taken place in our own country, which saw a wind of change blowing away crumbling edifices to return democracy to a people who had earned it 30 years ago, but from whom it had been snatched.

Tripartism of the social partners has worked. Although the experience is short in our country, I can say that it has brought the social partners better understanding of the severe problems which can confront a society going through a process of structural adjustment. The employers support this unadulterated model of tripartism and will strive at every opportunity to make it work and to protect it.

The process of change has, however, come at a time when there has been a serious degrading of the country's infrastructure, and at a time when economic recovery to improve the quality and the life of our people must be cast within the supervision of the international institutions – the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

On the employers' side, we need to create employment, we need to invest in new plant and technology, and we need to harmonize industrial practices to cope with the rising expectations of the workforce, and to do so within the ability of private investment to sustain and improve. This is a process that calls for understanding and the words of the Director-General in his Report can be instructive.

I refer to the points that he made in the Report as he reviewed the challenges facing the constituents, first and foremost, employers' and workers' organizations.

In this period of pain and change, the ILO must also review its programme of work and assistance. It would seem that too much emphasis has been placed on designing new standards through Conventions and instruments.

Employers generally have expressed dismay that such a programme should continue in the face of declining ratification for reasons of incompatibility, either within the world of work or in the state of development. We urge greater consideration in the field of training in the support for small business development, where productive employment demands support in the application and use of new technology.

The ILO office in the Caribbean, with the advent of the multidisciplinary teams, has been working closely with the Caribbean Employers' Confederation in designing programmes for the assistance of employers. I take this opportunity to thank the Regional Director and her staff for the interest and support which she has shown to our Organization.

I am happy to report that, in spite of its painful development which a structural adjustment programme will bring, Guyana has been experiencing significant growth in the mainstream productive industries, registering a growth of 7 per cent in GDP over the last three years. Increases in agricultural production have moved significantly and major areas of financial, fiscal and monetary controls have been deregulated, while the Government and the private sector regularly collaborate to define policies on privatization and investment.

Let me conclude, by expressing my appreciation of the President's wise and able conduct of this session of the Conference, and on my own behalf and on behalf of my delegation, wish to pay tribute to the wisdom and foresight of the Director-General and his staff, who must secure the contribution to peace and social justice which this Organization can inspire.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

Fifteenth sitting

Wednesday, 15 June 1994, 3 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Gray, Mr. Mendoza

STATEMENT OF THE PRESIDENT CONCERNING THE SPECIAL SITTING OF THE CONFERENCE

The PRESIDENT – I would like to begin by reading a statement concerning the special sitting.

The delegates will recall that a special sitting of the Conference is to be held tomorrow to consider the Appendix to the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

You will further recall that the list of speakers for the special sitting was closed on Tuesday, 14 June, 1994 at 6 p.m. so as to enable me, after consulting the Vice-Presidents, to submit to the Conference for decision, without debate, the proposal for a time-limit for speeches at the special sitting.

The list contains the names of 43 speakers, of whom seven are representatives of international non-governmental organizations. This number has enabled the Officers of the Conference to consider fixing the maximum length of speeches at seven minutes, it being understood that this would be a maximum, and that the average length of speeches would be five to six minutes, in order to respect the limits of the timetable already decided upon by the Conference.

An exception will be made in favour of the European Communities, whose spokesman will speak on behalf of 12 member governments. An exception will also be made in favour of the Arab Maghreb Union, whose spokesman will be the representative of the Government of Algeria. Since this contributes substantially to an overall reduction in the length of the debate, and since this practice is followed in other organizations, it appeared to the Officers of the Conference that as last year, it would be equitable, and in the interests of the Conference itself to increase the maximum length of these particular statements from seven to ten minutes.

Moreover, in order to ensure that the absolute deadline of 9 p.m. already fixed by the Conference is respected, the Officers of the Conference have also concluded that it should be understood that the President will periodically review the situation in the light of the number of speakers who remain on the list, and that the maximum time allotted to each speech will then be recalculated to conform to the time remaining for the speakers still on the list.

If there is no objection to these arrangements which have to be decided without debate by the Conference in accordance with article 14, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders, I will consider them adopted.

I would also like to inform the Conference of certain other arrangements concerning this sitting which fall within the prerogative of the President and the Officers of the Conference, but which I feel I should inform you of now in order to ensure complete clarity and to enable everyone to act accordingly.

The first concerns possible requests for the right of reply during this sitting. In order to save time, this right of reply will be granted at the end of the sitting, in a global, but not in a cumulative manner. This means an absolute limit of two minutes which was decided on in a general manner at the beginning of the Conference for the exercise of the right of reply. It will not be multiplied by the number of statements to which the speaker requesting this right wishes to respond, it being understood that the President may, if time permits, allow this limit to be somewhat exceeded if the reply concerns a large number of statements.

The second matter concerns non-governmental organizations, of which, as I have already mentioned, seven have registered for this sitting, but which may in principle only speak with the authorization of all the Officers of the Conference. My colleagues and I have concluded that they will only be authorized to speak at the end of the sitting, in the order in which they are registered, and only if their interventions do not result in the special sitting continuing beyond 9 p.m.

May I in conclusion emphasize that these arrangements have been decided upon by the Officers of the Conference in the interests of consistency and objectivity and of respecting the legitimate interests of all the parties concerned, with whom, moreover, there have been contacts. They are entirely in accordance with the spirit of consensus without which this special sitting could not take place. They should contribute, once again, to the success of an undertaking of whose importance everyone is aware.

The PRESIDENT – We will now continue our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Chinese: Mr. PAN (Employers' delegate) – On behalf of the Chinese Enterprise Management Association (CEMA) I should like to congratulate the President on having been elected at this session of the International Labour Conference. My congratulations also extend to the Vice-Presidents. I am confident that, under his chairmanship, this session will achieve success.

This year we gather here to celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO. The Director-General concludes in his Report that "ILO stands alone all for an ideal: that of promoting social justice in the world". In this post-Cold-War period, the main goal for all countries of the world is economic development. The essence of international competition is actually the struggle for the nation's overall strength based on her economic, scientific and technological power. Activities of the ILO will be welcomed and supported by its member countries only if these activities can promote the healthy growth of the national economy of its Members. And only under such a condition, will the ILO itself maintain its vitality and dynamism. In our present epoch, this is also a vivid standard in appraising whether or not it can promote social justice in the world.

After 15 years of reform and opening up, the economy of China has achieved unprecedented growth, and the standard of living of the people has improved distinctly. In the past 150 years in the modern history of China, there has never been any period in which the Chinese people could live in such an ever-improving situation as in these recent years. The success has been achieved by change and reform, and this change is based on China's 5,000 years of culture and tradition. Maybe there is no people like the Chinese who can feel so deeply how change may bring so much benefit through promoting economic development. Definitely, the prerequisite of change should produce a positive effect on economic growth and give people real benefit. It should not be change brought about by social disorder and chaos, which is a disaster for the people. No country can develop and prosper under chaotic conditions, and there has never been such a case in the history of mankind.

China set the goal of reform to establish a socialistic market economy in 1992. This is an extension and development of our economic reform in the past ten years.

This deep transformation has further advanced change in various aspects of economic and social life. After the 1992 GDP growth rate of 12.8 per cent, the rate in 1993 was maintained at 13.4 per cent. The deepening of reform has also brought about a change in the composition of ownership. We take the public sector, including state ownership and collective ownership as the main body of our economy and take self-employment, private ownership by foreign investment companies as a necessary supplement. Our policy encourages the parallel development of different ownership systems in the long term. The growth rate of industry in 1993 was 21.1 per cent, in which the growth rate of state ownership companies was 6.4 per cent, of rural township enterprises 41.3 per cent, and foreign investment companies 46.2 per cent. In the vast rural areas of China, establishments of township enterprises exceed 20 million, with more than 100 million job creations for the surplus of the agricultural labour force. Self-employment involves 29 million people, with 1.76 million establishments. By the end of this year, private companies in China will number 370,000, employing 5.35 million people. The number of foreign investment companies is now 174,000. In job creation in the urban areas in 1993, 2.78 million people were employed in the self-employment and private sector, which accounts for 39 per cent of total job creation in the year. The China Chamber of Commerce is a nationwide organization, which covers only the private sector, with more than 700,000 companies among its members.

With the change to a market economy, all the Chinese enterprises, no matter whether they are in the public or private sector, are facing a totally new situation. China wishes to develop her economy. It is necessary for her to train a large number of entrepreneurs. The mansion of socialist market economy in China could not be built without enough genuine entrepreneurs as a basis to support it. So the education and training of managers is the crucial issue, so that they can understand the basics of the market economy and master the art and techniques of market competition. Just in this regard, we have many things to learn from employers all over the world. And this is also a very influential area where the ILO can play an effective role. In such a populous country as China, with 1.2 billion inhabitants, there are many many things to learn from others when entering into a market economy. Training is only one of the fields.

From the above-mentioned figures for the enterprises under different types of ownership you can see that, as the delegate of the Chinese employers, I represent not just several hundreds of thousands of Chinese business leaders, or several millions, but tens of millions of Chinese employers. But you cannot hear the voice of the Employers' delegate of China in the Governing Body of the ILO, though he comes from one-fifth of the world's population, and as a representative of tens of millions of employers in the Orient. We do not intend to ask for anything. The Chinese Employers' delegate will never beg for a seat on the Governing Body. We are very pleased to see and to pay respect to our brotherly countries which have their seats there. But from the viewpoint of the ILO, as a global organization, can it be considered as reflecting the ideal of promoting social justice in the world after China has resumed her position in the ILO for a whole decade?

We are now living in a very diversified world. Economic development differs so greatly in different countries, which gives rise to different views on many issues. In setting Conventions and standards, the ILO has to fully consider these differences, so that Conventions and standards can mesh with the reality of various countries, so that they can be realistic and applicable in their implementation. To take the standpoint of some countries as that of all member nations is not feasible, and it neglects social justice, which the ILO itself focuses and insists on so strongly. A renowned English novelist in the 19th century, Jane Austen, wrote two famous novels, one called Sense and sensibility and another called Pride and prejudice. In the next three-quarters of a century, I sincerely hope that the ILO will use more of the former and less of the latter in dealing with its member countries, in order to maintain the justice and prestige of the ILO itself.

(Mr. Mendoza takes the Chair.)

Original Portuguese: Mr. WERNA DE SALVO (Employers' delegate, Brazil) – On behalf of the Brazilian employers, I extend my warmest congratulations to the President and Vice-Presidents on their election at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference and wish them every success in their high offices.

It is an honour for me to take the floor on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and on the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

With his customary skill and tact, the Director-General's Report presents an analysis of the objectives and means of action of the ILO, dating back to the Report that was submitted for consideration by the 1963 session of the Conference until now. Taking into consideration the magnitude and speed of the transformations that are occurring throughout the world, it proposes a new overall examination of the objectives and means of action of the Organization.

There are many questions deserving of our attention, but we have chosen three: tripartism, standard-setting activities and technical cooperation.

We, Brazilian employers, are convinced that tripartism is a natural consequence of free initiative, for only autonomy for employers and employees and by maintaining an equal distance from the authorities in relation to these forces can the harmonious progress and social justice to which we all aspire be ensured.

When dealing with labour-related matters and issues of general interest that are a government's responsibility, we are convinced that only through the dynamic and permanent use of tripartism can the State efficiently solve or prevent conflicts that arise without resorting to intervention, while still involving employers and workers through conscious and voluntary adhesion in collective bargaining subordinate to the general interest.

The most efficient way to reconcile the interests of social partners is collective bargaining for, while laws establish standards erga omnes and do not take into account the unequal burden that may indiscriminately fall on small, medium-sized and large enterprises, through collective bargaining the different socio-economic conditions of each region of a country, and how far each business, according to its size, productivity of profitability is able to implement decisions, can be weighed up.

The Director-General is correct when he points out that any assessment of the ILO's future activities should start with an evaluation of standard setting.

In effect, the legislative functions of the Organization merit extensive consideration and an analysis of their efficiency and response to the current world situation.

Thus, with regard to Conventions, all efforts must concentrate on updating standards that are no longer applicable and on revising others that, though still pertinent, have a low ratification rate. Since the effectiveness of rules does not stem from the sheer numbers produced but rather from their acceptance and overall observance, the reduction of the present rate of issuance of new standards becomes necessary.

It is consequently necessary to re-establish the real value and thrust of Recommendations which should no longer be considered as second rate instruments for merely complementing a Convention.

Conventions should only regulate the general idea of labour-related issues. Unique subjects and those dealing with sectors or specific labour conditions should be the subject of a Recommendation, for it has the needed flexibility and does not impose rigidities on the labour market.

On the other hand, the choice of subjects for future standards should not take place until the social and economic consequences in every region have been duly appraised with all due seriousness.

So as not to widen the chasm that exists between developed and developing countries due to the many different stages of development that exist among the member States, it is necessary to elaborate standards that are flexible and universal.

Here I must mention the point of view of the employers in my country with regards to the so-called "social clauses".

Our interpretation coincides with statements by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Brazil, Mr. Celles Amorim, in that "the attempt to link labour and commercial matters is far from being a authentic preoccupation with the universal protection of human rights. On the contrary, it aims to abolish the comparative advantages that developing countries have due to the lower wages that they offer as compared to those in developed countries".

Brazilian employers have repeatedly expressed their conviction that technical cooperation should by far prevail over any other ILO programme.

The battle against unemployment, underemployment and poverty calls for intense multilateral cooperation with a view to the formulation of policies aimed for generating full, productive and freely-chosen jobs to keep up with the growing active population; creation and support of "micro" and small enterprises; the establishment of vocational training programmes in response to demands by the production sector in terms of job skills and the use of new technologies.

International cooperation means that the parties involved should come to an agreement as regards how to satisfy their mutual needs without relinquishing their own specific interests, setting aside all isolationist, competitive and conflicting attitudes.

In this sense, technical cooperation, which is a kind of international cooperation, is indispensable for accelerating growth in developing countries in order to allow them to strengthen their internal markets and to set competitive prices for their products internationally.

The theoretical principle that states that technical cooperation basically represents the transfer and appropriation of technologies is difficult to apply in practice due to obstacles arising from the high costs of these technologies and the precarious economic capacity of developing countries to adequately absorb and disseminate them.

Thus, in economic and social terms, regional disparities are worsening, progressively distancing the developed countries from the underdeveloped or developing world. Countries such as Brazil, which overlaps both worlds owing to the yawning gaps between regions and sectors, face enormous difficulties in promoting development due to ever-increasing technological barriers.

Therein lies a future task of the ILO, that of redefining and promoting technical cooperation, and convincing developing countries of the need for international cooperation.

On the other hand, new technologies which we have yet to master represent a huge challenge. A nation cannot gain a foothold in the international market other than through education, instruction and vocational training.

It is in this context that the ILO should focus on the social aspects of technological and scientific development when elaborating its technical cooperation projects.

Finally, it is important to point out that Brazilian employers have a particular interest in the establishment of the ILO programmes inspired by two recent resolutions of the International Labour Conference: the resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely-chosen employment and the resolution concerning employment promotion as an essential component of overall development.

Brazilian employers are confident that the ILO, in coordination with other international organizations, will play a decisive part in the elimination – or at least a reduction – of the obstacles facing the consolidation of global strategies of development and growth and their implementation within a framework of economic progress and social justice.

The demanding challenges and responsibilities that the Organization faces increase our expectation that this session of the Conference will produce favourable results.

Original French: Mr. PARROT (Workers' delegate, Canada) – I should first like to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents of the Conference on their election. I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Director-General's Report.

I would like to agree with his analysis to the effect that the ILO is going through a crisis which is partly a reflection of the catastrophic situation facing workers around the world.

The so-called "new world order" that has replaced the Cold War paradigm has become a nightmare for millions of workers and their families. In seeking to promote globalization, transnational corporations, collectively wielding assets in trillions of dollars, have become the driving force behind global market integration.

Following the example of their predecessors prior to the ILO's birth 75 years ago, powerful corporate leaders increasingly attribute the slow-down in economic growth and foreign investment to trade unions and the social priorities they advocate. All too often public authorities have responded with a nod of approval.

As the Director-General's Report points out, new technology, combined with an absence of global political will to pursue full employment policies, has created labour markets that have take up the challenge of higher productivity, while accepting a rise in unemployment. Millions of workers, representing some 30 per cent of the world's workforce, are idle, while factories work around the clock.

What makes this world employment crisis worse is an emerging definition of competitiveness that savagely pits the wages and conditions of workers in industrialized countries against those of workers living in countries where wages are 20 times lower.

In addition to placing enormous downward pressure on social standards, this situation has produced a staggering global social crisis.

The distribution of wealth in the world is becoming more inequitable. In 1990 the richest 20 per cent of the world's population had an income that was 60 times greater than that of the poorest 20 per cent. Survey after survey shows that the gap is widening, both within countries and between countries. The poor suburbs of large cities in the North and South have begun to appear more alike as increasing numbers of jobless and homeless workers wander the streets.

Yet, to our peril, the link between the lack of social cohesion and the trend towards social disintegration seems more lost on public policy-makers at the national and international level today than it was 75 years ago. The ILO's mission is to pursue world peace through the promotion of social justice. The absence of the ILO in the formulation of the United Nations An agenda for peace is perhaps the best example of the lack of appreciation for the social dimension within the leadership of the world.

After more than ten years of ideologically based deregulation, many governments are sitting on the sidelines with increasing irrelevance in a global economy which is almost without borders. In this context, intergovernmental institutions promoting social standards, such as the ILO, are threatened by attempts to strip them of any real influence.

In my own country, ILO standards, especially those dealing with the rights of workers in the public sector, are often flagrantly violated on the grounds that they constitute an impediment to austerity-based budget making. In other countries, unabashed attempts are made by governments to exempt themselves from universal workers' rights on the basis of cultural exceptionalism or, more truthfully, because of the exigencies of rapid industrialization.

In the view of the Canadian workers, the question of principle facing the ILO at this point in its history is not one of definition but rather one of leadership. The adoption of the goals of wild capitalism into public policy-making has left a gap on the social side that must be filled.

The ILO was never envisaged as a mirror to reflect the existing realities of the prevailing international economic and social climate. The ILO was created to provide leadership in the promotion of social justice by bringing together governments, workers and employers and helping them to motivate themselves to bring this about. It is time to renew this sense of leadership.

Workers everywhere have their backs to the wall, fighting attacks launched against many of the social gains achieved during this century. As we wage these battles we look for leadership and support to the ILO, the only intergovernmental organization devoted to workers' interests.

Canadian workers are also concerned about some of the language in the Report which suggests an acquiesence to the demand for exceptions in the application of universal standards. While the calls for exceptions come from governments, we know very well that many of them are inspired by the corporate sector. We think that there is no area of ILO work that is more demanding of steadfast leadership than the promotion of universal standards and principles. A global village with a global economy but no global rules is a recipe for moral anarchy.

In our view, in its 75th year the ILO should be reaffirming its role as an institution that promotes and safeguards social standards while acting as the chief United Nations advocate for the adoption of universal social standards in international trade, aid and finance policy-making. This is not a time for meekness or the promotion of voluntary restraints on corporate conduct. It is a time for active reregulation of the global economy through the establishment of social clauses based upon basic ILO standards. In the absence of a defunct United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations, an ILO strategy should be developed to set standards for international corporate behaviour.

The soft law approach of the Director-General is therefore unacceptable. Rather, new ways must be found of applying standards more effectively. In particular: the setting of new standards must continue; standards on freedom of association, discrimination and forced and child labour should be declared a world charter of workers' rights, with the ILO campaigning for their universal ratification and application; a complaints mechanism like the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Committee on Freedom of Association should be extended to cover all the standards in the world charter.

An active ILO campaign promoting standards would undoubtedly offend some governments, especially the historical special pleaders. After all, the demand for social progress has often been viewed as an affront to free market advocates. In fact, it could be argued that the mandate of the ILO is itself an affront to the free market. There is no need for apologies.

And finally, a word about the issue of employment. I agree fully with the emphasis placed on the world employment crisis in the Report. There are some governments, and the Canadian Government is one of them, that have sent strong signals to their electorates that they are serious about abandoning market liberalization as a primary policy tool and are ready to pursue a course of full employment promotion through active intervention. This attitude must be encouraged and forcefully taken up by the ILO.

Given that unilateral action could place well-intentioned governments at a competitive disadvantage, a key to such a change in course will be the willingness of countries to engage in economic cooperation. Once again, universal social and other standards will be essential to building the necessary confidence for joint action.

A pertinent example is the need for active promotion of a social clause in the new World Trade Organization (WTO). Such a clause should contain ILO standards and the ILO itself should play a clear, decisive and pivotal role in its elaboration and implementation.

Canadian workers see no contradiction or conflict between the goal of full employment and progressive labour legislation and we fail to understand why the Report suggests that these contradictions or conflicts could exist.

The idea that more jobs can be created by removing basic worker protections is dangerous and wrong. The ILO must reject any trade-off between the quantity and the quality of employment. It must play an increased role in international policies designed to boost jobs and tackle poverty throughout the world.

Employment without the possibility of collective bargaining will do little to resolve the distributive and social problems of a society. In promoting employment, the ILO should be fostering the idea that quality production and employment accompany organized labour.

Solving the problems caused by increased unemployment and productivity will require the willingness of governments, workers and employers to embrace innovation and manage change. Here again, the ILO can and should be playing a pivotal role through the promotion of standards and by the offer of technical assistance to those doing research on working time and other innovative solutions.

After more than a decade of being mesmerized by the rhetoric of the free market, the international community needs to be reawakened to the prospects for peace and prosperity through the struggle for social justice. On this, the 75th anniversary of the ILO, Canadian workers depend upon a strong International Labour Organization to provide both support and leadership in this task and today we reaffirm our commitment to do what we can to help.

Original Spanish: Mr. NAVARRO CABRERA (Employers' delegate, Cuba) – In taking the floor at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, I should like to congratulate the President on his election.

In celebrating its 75th anniversary, I should also like to express special gratitude to this Organization for its contribution to world peace.

The Director-General's Report this year has set itself the task of evaluating the ILO's past achievements and adopting new decisions for fresh activities; he has taken as his basis the very purpose of the Organization which is to support an ideal: promotion of social justice. Looking at the first few chapters, I would like to offer a few reflections.

I would be lacking in objectivity in not recognizing that the world today has changed and that we are living with a new international economic order. But the task at hand is to analyse the pros and cons of this new order with respect to social justice.

That is why I would like to put forward my concept of economic and social development, since it is very closely linked to the aforementioned concept of social justice.

This concept begins by establishing a link of organic interdependence between the economic and social aspects of development which may be seen as an integral entity aimed ultimately at changing human beings, making them nicer, healthier, better educated and more involved with and supportive of their fellows.

Development is not just economic growth, nor the form it takes; rather it is the way production is shared out and how the economic and social inequalities that stem from under-development and poverty are overcome.

Can we therefore state categorically that the market economy is a magic formula that will solve the inequality, under-development and poverty afflicting a large part of humanity? Since 1990, global growth in production has undershot its potential. In 1993, for the third consecutive year, global production grew more slowly than world population. In developed countries with market economies, production continues to stagnate, and in transitional-economy countries, it is declining.

In market-economy developed countries, the number of unemployed rose by 5.6 million and a total of nearly 30 million unemployed has been forecast; this means that almost 8 per cent of these countries' workforce will be jobless.

One of the great anachronisms of our times is that, although the world produces food enough to meet the needs of the world's population, there are huge numbers of people, especially in the developing countries, suffering from hunger or malnutrition, and many people are still dying from starvation every year. The number of people undernourished may be as high as 780 million, that is to say some 20 per cent of the total population of the developing countries.

If this is the result of the dominant economic system in the market economy world, we may well doubt what the Director-General says in his Report about the adoption of a market economy enjoying widespread public support because it inspired hope for a better future. We might expect that the 780 million hungry, the millions of unemployed, and the many other millions lacking the most basic resources – precisely because of the worldwide spread of the market economy – will not be in agreement with this statement. Would it not be more equitable to globalize the solution to the world's economic and social problems and thus solve the problems of the Third World which, after all, account for three-quarters of humanity?

In his Report, the Director-General refers to certain factors speeding up the globalization of the economy, including: expansion of world trade, and the growing inter-connection of financial markets.

But what is happening is that, in this increasingly transnationalized and globalized world, in which Latin America has to struggle for survival, competitiveness, in the best of cases, is a deceptive naivety. Amidst the upheavals brought about by competition, which involves the trade deficits of certain major powers and their jousts with other powers for domination of the markets of the 21st century, Latin America is a passive bystander that has lost its world-trade clout.

There is no way we can escape the dangers to which our America is exposed if, instead of deciding our own integration approach, we allow others to integrate us in their image and likeness in a process of globalization and planetary competence in which we might end up playing a rearguard action.

Speaking of the link between trade liberalization and the respect of certain labour standards and social protection, that famous "social clause", I consider the ILO should give priority in its programmes to creating jobs, to creating better conditions of work and to protecting the conditions. But the ILO should not influence the development of social rights unless there are mechanisms hampering economic growth and, consequently, employment growth.

As regards Cuba, our economy cannot be viewed in the same way as that of other countries, where trends can be called "cyclical". In our case, we are faced with a very specific situation. Ours is a country which is being affected by the collapse of what had been the basis of its foreign trade and which had a very important impact on the growth of its domestic economy.

Alongside this collapse, it is suffering from the intensification of an economic blockade to which it has been subject for the last 20 or 30 years. It is thus affected by two major causes acting together.

Nevertheless, the Cuban economy has shown great capacity to resist without renouncing either its social qualities, the guiding role of the State or the principles of socialist distribution.

At this present time, we are creating the conditions for something more than a business cycle boom. We are trying to ensure the viability of a socialist model under new circumstances.

The main organizational changes that have taken place in Cuba, in opening ourselves to the world, have been as follows:

- decentralization of foreign trade management starting with the elimination of the state foreign trade monopoly. Halfway through 1993, a total 287 Cuban economic agents of various kinds were involved or active in foreign trade. This is a sharp increase from the figure of 70 in the early 1980s;
- new negotiation modalities based on the development of a new concept of "business engineering". Up until November 1993, 112 joint ventures or other forms of economic associations were working with foreign undertakings. Another novel feature has been the increasing interest Cuban undertakings have shown in looking at setting up economic relationships in other countries;
- creation of new economic agents such as trading companies set up basically as joint stock companies. These companies, also called Cuban private firms, are basically of two kinds: truly speaking, Cuban firms and joint ventures between a Cuban entity and a foreign company. This type of Cuban-capital trading company may have different forms of autonomy, operational activity and employment structure to those found in State undertakings. By mid-1993, 101 private Cuban companies had been registered. In addition, there is a significantly growing number of foreign firms that are increasingly active as economic agents in Cuba;
- new operating functions and styles have developed in state institutions in our country as a result of promulgation of the legislative decree on the reorganization of the Central State Administration aimed at reducing the ministries and their staffs to give them greater authority.

Finally, may I say that, although our country is in a very difficult position which demands heavy sacrifices from us, we have a people sturdy enough and idealistic enough to continue our progress.

Original Chinese: Mr. LI (Workers' delegate, China) – First of all, may I warmly congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on their election. I am convinced that under their guidance this session of the International Labour Conference will be a complete success.

The representative of the Chinese workers has taken note of the concern the session has shown for change. Now, at a time of multipolarity in the world and the globalization of the economy, all countries are exploring ways for change. China is also making efforts to deepen its reform. We believe that, given the immense differences between countries, no change should be made that fails to take account of a country's circumstances by imposing a uniform model, that fails to seek the active participation of workers or, even worse, that is at the expense of their interests. As the Director-General points out in his Report, in contrast to the sluggish economy in the world, China's economy has registered a sustained growth in the 1990s. China's reform is one with Chinese characteristics and this is the very fundamental reason for China's remarkable achievements.

Reform has brought about profound changes in China. Those who have benefited most from reform are the people. Over the past 15 years of economic reform, China's national economy has grown at an average annual rate of 8.6 per cent and the income of workers by 5.6 per cent. In 1993 alone the per capita income of urban residents actually increased by 10.2 per cent.

Trade unions in China mobilize and organize workers to participate actively in reform where their fundamental interests lie. At the same time, they are fully aware that the establishment of the socialist market economic structure calls for a further strengthening of trade union functions to effectively protect the specific interests of workers. A great deal of work has been done towards this end, in particular the following.

First, trade unions participate in the management of state and social affairs on behalf of workers, take an active part in various reforms that involve the interest of workers and, in particular, in the formulation of reform programmes in the fields of wages, employment, social security, health care and housing, which bear on the vital interests of hundreds of millions of workers, as well as in the enactment of relevant laws and regulations.

Second, the trade unions propose that the following principles must be adhered to in the reform process: democratic and scientific policy-making: all major measures and reforms plans that involve the vital interests of workers must be subject to extensive discussion by workers; workers as a whole must benefit; no reform measure should be too drastic for workers to endure. The overall capacity of endurance of the overwhelming majority of workers should be taken into account in reforms to make sure that basic living conditions are guaranteed.

Third, the trade unions in China convey the demands and requests of workers on the basis of investigations and research and by vigorously encouraging workers to participate in discussions so that every reform measure takes into account the actual capacity of endurance of workers, psychologically and economically, and accommodates the interests of the State, collectives and individuals.

The current session coincides with the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The trade unions in China believe that the ILO has done a lot of useful work in its long history for the achievement of the objectives and purposes enshrined in the Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. However, the ILO is confronted with grave challenges as mankind approaches the 21st century. Here I wish to make the following comments concerning the future work of the ILO.

The objectives and purposes set forth in the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia are still of major practical significance. We deem it an important task to make continuous efforts to achieve those purposes and objectives. The end of the bipolar structure has not only brought about the universal peace ardently aspired to by mankind. People in many regions are still suffering from wars and chaos as a result of power politics. Economic globalization has not changed the long-standing irrational economic international order. The gap between the North and South is further widening. As mentioned in the Director-General's Report, the countries with the richest 20 per cent of the world's population received 59 times more than those with the poorest 20 per cent in 1989, as against 30 times in 1960. So there is still a long way to go before the ILO can achieve its purposes and objectives of lasting world peace and the eradication of poverty and unemployment on the basis of social justice.

The ILO should give top priority to providing jobs and eradicating poverty. To this end, it should focus its efforts on the developing countries. Today's economies are interdependent and the interests of the workers of various nations are also closely inter-connected. Any further deterioration in the economy and workers' livelihood in the developing countries will seriously affect not only their own development but also the economic growth of the developed countries and the world at large. Furthermore, it will pose a potential threat to world peace and stability. The developing countries have suffered from cruel exploitation and plunder as a result of the current inequitable international economic order. They are still faced with numerous difficulties. Except for a few countries and regions, the achievement of long-term social stability and progress, sustained economic development, full employment and poverty reduction remains a grave challenge. The ILO should help to put an end to this situation.

The ILO should adhere to tripartism and fully activate the three social partners in its member countries, the workers in particular. The various organs of the ILO should be universal and representative, comprising representatives of different political inclinations, from different regions and from countries at different levels and stages of development. The ILO should listen to the opinions of all sides on major issues concerning international labour and should involve tripartite representatives in its important activities. Only in this way can the ILO develop and grow in strength.

The trade unions in China attach great importance to and actively participate in ILO activities. We are ready to strengthen our cooperation with the ILO and workers' representatives of other countries in an effort to contribute towards achieving the objectives and purposes of the ILO.

Original German: Mr. ARBESSER-RASTBURG (Employers' delegate, Austria) – I should like first of all, on behalf of the Austrian employers, to congratulate the President on his election to steer the deliberations of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. I am sure, that under his guidance, he will be able to master the difficult problems before this Conference, at a time when the International Labour Organization is celebrating its 75th anniversary.

Austria, in particular the employers in my country, attaches considerable importance to the work of the ILO; it is therefore quite natural that I should report to you on some of the activities of the Austrian employers and share with you our thoughts on the future of the Organization.

Section XIII of the Peace Treaty of Versailles set up the International Labour Organization – and Austria became a member on 29 May 1920. For economic reasons, Austria was only able to send a full delegation to the 5th Session of the International Labour Conference in 1923. From 1923 to 1937 Dr. Theodor Schmidt was the employers' delegate for Austria.

In a commemorative publication issued on the 40th anniversary of the ILO, Dr. Schmidt spoke of the considerable friendliness that the creator or the ILO, Albert Thomas, had always shown towards Austria and of his profound understanding for the suffering and tribulations of the young Republic – as it was at the time. Thomas had also been concerned by the disintegration of the economic space of the former Danubian Monarchy. We can therefore see that soon after it was established, the ILO already had very close ties with Austria.

For ten years, Dr. Schmidt was a member of the so-called Committee of Paragraph 408 (of the Peace Treaty of Versailles); this Committee established the supervisory machinery of the ILO, i.e., it controlled the implementation of Conventions ratified by member States.

After the Second World War, Austria once again joined the ILO – on 29 June 1947; since then Austrian employers' delegates have played an important role in industrial committees and at the International Labour Conference.

The following Employers' delegates have belonged or still belong to the Governing body: Dr. Weinberger, Dr. Hoynigg, Mr. Mautner- Markhof and myself. Indeed, I have belonged to this body since 1978 and have been involved in four Governing Body Committees. Furthermore, in 1987 I was Vice-President of the European Regional Conference.

Mention should be made of Dr. Wunschheim who was a member of the Workers' delegation to the Conference for many years; in fact I succeeded him in 1979.

I think the time has now come, on this the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, to voice a few thoughts on the future of our Organization.

I believe that the people who belong to and work for this Organization are of the utmost importance; consequently the choice of staff is vital if we are to attain our objectives. But of course, it goes without saying, that they must be adequately trained to cope with the demands of modern management.

We must strive to ensure that we have greater influence amongst international organizations; and we must make our presence felt at the Social Summit for Social Development which is to be held next year in Copenhagen. The ILO is the social conscience of the world and must play a leading role in social matters within the United Nations family.

Standard-setting is a decisive task of our Organization; however it would seem that many new Conventions have only been ratified by a few member States. We must therefore ensure that older Conventions are renewed so that they can be dovetailed to the circumstances of the present and the future.

The world has changed decisively in recent years. We must take more account of these changes, and above all, we must pay attention to the establishment of new employers' and workers' organizations in the new member States and in the new democracies of Central and Eastern Europe.

Above all, we must try to improve technical assistance for the developing countries. More funds from other organizations, for example the World Bank and the UNDP, should also be earmarked for this type of assistance.

Since I do not have much time at my disposal, I am unable to discuss all the items I would like to have done. However, it is vital that there should be full cooperation, based on confidence, between leading executives and Members of our Organization.

The 75th anniversary of the ILO provides us with an opportunity to review our work: a challenge which the Director-General has taken up in his Report.

In concluding, we must all join forces to try and guarantee social peace, thereby laying the foundations for world peace.

Original French: Mr. MBILA (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Cameroon) – It is a great honour and pleasure for me to take the floor before this august assembly, on behalf of my country and of my delegation.

First of all we would like to congratulate the President as well as the Vice-Presidents on their election. We are sure that under their leadership our work will be very successful. Our congratulations also go to the Director-General for the high quality of his Report on the future policy of our Organization.

As we solemnly celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO, and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Cameroon, I would like to affirm and reaffirm our commitment to the aims of the ILO.

This is also the reason why our Government was determined to celebrate these two anniversaries in an appropriate manner despite the fact that we are going through a difficult period of structural adjustment with its inevitable social consequences.

On the 5th of May we launched the anniversary celebrations with radio and television broadcasts. The celebrations involved banners, posters and leaflets in provincial capitals and in other industrial cities. We projected documentary films about ILO on national television; we organized two televised round-table discussions on the technical cooperation with the ILO and on international labour standards. We launched a song and drawing contest on the theme of "People at Work". We mentioned the events on a postal cancellation stamp, and we also brought out a commemorative stamp, and an evening ceremony to celebrate the event and to award the prizes was also organized.

All these activities were marked by the stamp of tripartism and were designed to make national public opinion aware of the ideals of the ILO. While the celebration of an anniversary is, of course, an occasion to look back and rejoice at what has already been done, it is also important to prepare the ground for the future.

Most of us agree with the proposals of the Director-General as regards standard-setting activities for the years to come, but we would also like to stress the twofold requirements for countries undergoing structural adjustment programmes to ensure both economic recovery and compliance with international labour standards. For example, it is quite clear that the ideal of full employment outlined in Convention No. 122 is often flouted in a period of structural adjustment when thousands and thousands of workers are made redundant.

The social dimension of structural adjustment was developed precisely to soften the harmful consequences on the social environment, but in the face of this huge task, it would be desirable to find other complementary solutions.

Of course the States have a major role to play in this particular field, but it seems to us that the second field of activity of the ILO, namely technical cooperation, should support their efforts more effectively than in the past.

With this in mind, we call upon the countries of the North to increase their development aid, despite their present difficulties, in order to prevent the marginalization of countries in the South, and to allow them to revive their economies which are beset by many ills, including decolonization, devaluations, as well as the decline in financial investments, as in the case of Cameroon, for example.

We would also like to invite the member States of our Organization to ratify amendments to the ILO Constitution, because democratization should not be limited to member States, but should also and above all apply within international organizations such as ours, the fundamental principle of which is reflected in its tripartite nature.

In conclusion, the Republic of Cameroon salutes the advent of a pluralistic and majority-based democracy in South Africa. This is one of those historic victories of which the international community as a whole can be proud. This also applies to our Organization, which worked for many years to raise the awareness of world public opinion regarding the wretched conditions of the workers.

May the same kind of interest be shown towards those developing countries that are in danger of being marginalized so that the main objective of our Organization, namely social justice, is attained, not only amongst individuals, but also amongst States, for as the Declaration of Philadelphia teaches us: "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

ADDRESS BY HIS EXCELLENCY MR M. GRYB, PRESIDENT OF THE SUPREME SOVIET OF BELARUS.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MENDOZA) – I am now pleased to call on Mr. Gryb, President of the Supreme Soviet of Belarus. But before giving the floor to him, let me introduce him to you. A lawyer by education, Mr. Gryb graduated from the Belarussian State University in 1967. In 1990 he was elected a people's deputy of the Republic of Belarus. He was head of the Commission of the Supreme Soviet of Belarus on national security, defence and crime prevention. Mr. Gryb was elected President of the Supreme Soviet of the Republic of Belarus on 28 January 1994. I now give the floor to Mr. Gryb.

Original Russian: Mr. GRYB (President of the Supreme Soviet of Belarus) – Allow me to express my gratitude at being afforded this opportunity to address you and to pay our respects to the oldest international organization in the United Nations system on its 75th anniversary.

Allow me to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to their responsible posts at this session of the Conference and wish them every success in their very important work.

On behalf of the Supreme Soviet of the Republic of Belarus, the highest legislative body of our country, please accept our sincere congratulations on this 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. Allow me, also, to wish you continued success in combating poverty and promoting social justice and peace. These were the noble aims enshrined in the Constitution of the ILO and laid the foundations for its activities. This Organization is an institutionalized international body, called upon to deal with very important and urgent problems.

It should be pointed out that although celebrating this momentous occasion, the ILO has not looked inward and heralded its triumphs but is setting its sights on the future and considering how it can adapt its work to ensure that it is more effective.

The end of the Cold War and ideological confrontation impels us to devise a strategy for solving urgent social problems in a global economy.

Allow me to congratulate the Director-General on his constructive and judicious approach which makes an important, intellectual contribution to the theory and practice of state administration and international relations.

The Republic of Belarus is a young State. Having opted for independent national development, we have upheld our commitment to the principles set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other international instruments on civil, political, social and economic rights and freedoms.

Belarus has ratified 42 ILO Conventions, six of them last year. Preparations have been made to ratify a further three Conventions. It is essential that our sovereign State based on the rule of law, which is only just beginning to draw up legislation, should avoid making any mistakes and follow the course laid down in world practice. I would also like to express our gratitude to the Director-General for the successful work carried out by staff of the International Labour Office and their invaluable assistance and contribution to the development of labour legislation in my country.

I believe that the role and significance of the ILO in dealing with the tasks of social justice and peace, and combating world poverty in accordance with its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia should be enhanced. Discussion at this session will enable the political leaders of many countries when they gather in Copenhagen at the World Summit for Social Development to have a conception of and support the idea of extending the ILO's authority with regard to coordinating the activities of international organizations and drafting rules, standards and policies for managing the world economy.

The liberalization of world trade and the movement of capital will have a considerable impact on economic growth, employment and reducing poverty but is no guarantee of social justice in all countries or nations. That is why the international community must pay greater attention to the social aspects of the global economy, with a greater role accorded to the ILO in this sphere.

Unfortunately, the situation in my country remains difficult. So far we have failed to halt the decline in production levels, improve people's standard of living or regulate the financial, credit and monetary system. At the same time, however, we are doing a great deal to tackle certain elements of the social and economic crisis. At the beginning of this year, a new Constitution was adopted, endowing us with a democratic society and socially-oriented market economy. Democratic workers' and employers' organizations have been established and will have a greater role to play in the social and economic life of the country.

On 23 June this year, we will hold national elections to choose the first President of the Republic.

As we move towards the establishment of a democratic and socially-oriented State we will need to work ever more closely with the ILO and the International Labour Office. The Report of the Director-General quite rightly expounds new forms of cooperation with the countries embarking on a democratic form of development. In this connection, we welcome the efforts made by the leadership of the ILO to modernize the Organization's work and improve its structures in the field. It seems to us that it would be expedient to set up an ILO department in Minsk, where the headquarters of the Commonwealth of Independent States is located. The Republic is ready to consider helping with the running of a branch of this nature.

The receptiveness of the ILO to political and economic changes in the world today puts the ILO in a privileged position in terms of promoting new and constructive initiatives and acting as a focal point for all nations and countries. We hope that the ILO both now and in the future will contribute as much as possible to solving the urgent problems of the day.

Finally, I would like once more to express our respect for the ILO and confirm our readiness to do all we can to develop constructive cooperation with this Organization.

Original French: Mr. TINAYRE (representative of the World Union of Professions) – This is the first time that the social and professional sector of the liberal professions has addressed our assembly. Let me start by saying, on their behalf, how highly they appreciate the honour they have been given, and how important they consider your work, your deliberations and their participation. They are keenly aware of the considerable work and achievements of the ILO over the past 75 years. They are particularly conscious of the new dynamism which, in pursuance of its traditional vocation, is today being proposed by the Director-General in his remarkable Report.

The liberal professions have noted with interest the three challenges presented in the conclusion of this Report, with a view to adapting the International Labour Organization to the new demands of the world of today and tomorrow. They support them entirely. Among these challenges they have taken particular note of the determination to be open to other actors on the social scene. They concur in the desire to see assembled round the ILO, to work towards the same ideal, representatives of civil society and which the Director-General refers to as intermediate groups, without which a genuinely democratic society cannot function.

The liberal professions share this view, and they are ready, for their part, through their organization, of which I have the honour of being President, to respond to this appeal if it is made by the ILO. And they have, perhaps, some reason to be heard.

It should be realized that the legal, medical and technical liberal professions throughout the world, contrary to what might be thought, and despite their apparent diversity, constitute a surprisingly specific and homogeneous group. Specific, because they use an absolutely unique approach.

The liberal professions claim to be legally, economically and politically independent. They are answerable for their actions. They are detached from all speculative elements, expecting to be paid for their services only and owing nothing, professionally speaking, to capitalistic processes. They are subject to a strict code of ethics, especially to professional secrecy which they insist must be as absolute as possible. Contrary to what is thought in certain quarters, the only justification for this lies in the service and confidence of their fellow human beings. In consulting a doctor, a lawyer, an accountant, a solicitor or an architect, a person must be sure that he can say whatever he likes, that the professional he is consulting is not the antenna of a political regime, the police or an economic, social or cultural force to which he will subsequently betray such confidences.

In fact, it should be realized that the principles that we have just set forth are to be found everywhere: first of all, in the professions: the veterinary surgeon, the accountant, the solicitor, the masseur, the consultant engineer, despite their apparent heterogeneity, all obey similar rules and speak the same ethical language. There are, on our planet, hundreds of millions of members of the liberal professions, and I can assure you that, despite different latitudes, traditions, political regimes and cultures, all of them, sometimes at the risk of their lives, are committed to the defence of these principle, and they fight for them if they are denied. This unity is the source of an intense associative life. It should also be realized that, to our knowledge, in about a hundred countries in the world, there are interprofessional groups of members of the liberal profession which constitute social partners at national level, side by side with the employers' and workers' organizations; interprofessional multinational organizations, doyens of single-professional organizations of lawyers, doctors, architects and, finally, with its mandate to represent all these groups, the World Union of Professions, of which I have the honour to be President, and which addresses this assembly for the first time.

Such are the liberal professions in these closing years of the twentieth century, that you have been kind enough to welcome in your midst, and we feel that we can add both a testimony and a contribution to your work.

The testimony is that of a system of working which is atypical in two very different domains: in the first place, to be sure, members of the liberal professions are employers. They have their secretaries, clerks, switchboard operators, nurses, assistants, but they are not like other employers. In fact, on the one hand, the generally limited size of the premises in which they practise gives rise to particular working methods. On the other hand, the obligation to assist and advise, to which the liberal professions are bound, especially in the medical and legal fields, inevitably has a material effect on their working conditions.

There are emergency cases where the implications for public order may require immediate action, at night as well as in the daytime, on days of rest and other days. There is the necessity to go from place to place and precarious working conditions which are incompatible with normal standards.

Many more examples could be given. They would all speak for a very specific type of work system.

But, in the second place, this specific aspect becomes even more striking when it applies, not to an ordinary wage-earner, but to a professional with the same status as an employer. The statutory independence enjoyed by both the one and the other, since they belong to the same structure, the ethical constraints which this implies, the training necessary in both cases also give rise to unique problems which are found nowhere else and which demand particular consideration.

Of course in this brief speech I cannot even touch upon this discussion. It is enough to know of its existence and to conclude that the failure to adjust of legislation and regulations drafted from the perspective of the labour world, and of trade and industry, can create in this sector, given the current situation, distortions and constraints and subsequently dissuasions due to a lack of awareness about this specific issue.

However, as this sector is currently in full demographic expansion, the solving of these problems may well have a considerable impact on unemployment.

As regards the contribution that the liberal professions consider they can make to the ILO's position, this is both part of its traditional vision and its vision of the future.

On the first point, it would be most valuable if the ILO examined the standards intended to harmonize labour relations in this sector at three levels: for salaried employees, i.e. assistants who do not belong to the profession; for collaborators, i.e. employees who belong to the same profession as the employer and who therefore pose special problems at the ethical level, for example due to conscience or secrecy clauses; and lastly, for a very specific category which is that of joint collaborators, whether or not members of the profession, of which there are numerous examples in the liberal professions, which could cause one to think of a voluntary professional status.

We could mention many other issues here, in particular trade union rights, training and developing countries.

Finally, on the second point, namely perspectives, it seems, amongst other things, that the steps taken with regard to the work of liberal professions is a case in point and may provide a springboard for considering job sharing.

The stability of a surgery, office or agency for the liberal professions is the product of how many clients it has, the clients being in fact the employers of the professional worker. Perhaps something might be concluded from this.

These are the matters for consideration raised for the liberal professions on reading the Director-General's Report. The World Union of Professions, aware of its lack of experience of your discussions and the apprenticeship it must undergo, humbly submits its opinions on your comments.

We thank you for any attention you may give to them, and if you pick up on only one aspect we hope that it is the joy felt by the liberal professions at being amongst you and their determination to work with you in your basic task of ensuring justice and peace.

Original Arabic: Mr. DEGOL (Minister of Labour, Eritrea) – It is a great pleasure and honour for me to convey to the greetings of the people and Government of Eritrea.

I should first like to congratulate the President on behalf of my country on his election to the chair of this session. We are sure that his wisdom and experience will stand him in good stead in the conduct of the proceedings.

I would like to say how deeply I appreciate the work that the Director-General of the ILO put into the preparation of this Conference.

This session is particularly important since it coincides with the 75th anniversary of the establishment of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which set out the aims of the Organization and the working methods to be followed in pursuit of those aims.

In his Report the Director-General gave us a comprehensive and objective overview of the activities of the ILO and its future outlook in the service of tripartism in the Organization. He pointed out that the ILO had a duty to provide technical assistance in order to play its full role in bringing about progress and equality in the world.

You are all aware that Eritrea has just emerged from a war that was one of the longest and most vicious in the continent of Africa, raging for no less than 30 years. Eritrea acquired during that period a tremendous capacity for self-reliance, given that the international community at the time deliberately turned a blind eye to its situation. The impact of this colonialist war was predictable: total destruction of everything and every part of this little poverty-stricken country. Eritrea is at present attempting to shake off this heavy and repulsive colonial burden but it has monstrous challenges to face, in particular the rebuilding of Eritrea's economic infrastructure, which has been completely destroyed. We are convinced that we will have to rely primarily on our own capacity to find a way out of this impasse, just as we did during the struggle for freedom. But we also know that we cannot do without international support and cooperation in the reconstruction process. The international community has certain responsibilities towards Eritrea, which suffered so much on account of its policy of deliberately ignoring our just national cause in the past.

Eritrea has been ruled by two colonial regimes in the last 30 years: the feudal regime of Emperor Haile Selasse and the "DERG", the bloodthirsty military regime that followed it. These two regimes treated Eritrea as a land without a people and therefore failed to respect even the most basic human rights in the country, not to mention the organization of proper working conditions. As a result, immediately after the country's liberation in 1991, the Government of Eritrea attached great importance to this matter, promulgating Labour Law No. 8/1991. However, when we attempted to put this legislation into practice, we found that it contained a number of shortcomings that needed to be remedied. The Eritrean Minister of Labour has therefore prepared a working document designed to improve the legislation and has organized a number of seminars attended by workers, employers, the Chamber of Commerce and the Eritrean Investment Centre. A decision is expected in the near future on the application of the amended version of the law.

In conclusion, I should like to express my deep gratitude and appreciation to the ILO, represented by its Director-General and its regional offices in Abidjan and Harare, for its support and assistance in training Eritrean workers and officials. We also wish this Conference every success in its work. Lastly, we would like to congratulate the people of South Africa and wish them every success.

Original Portuguese: Mr. SILVA (Workers' delegate, Cape Verde) – First of all, Mr. Gray has been entrusted with the presidency of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference and we would like to congratulate him on his election.

The Report of the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, presented to this Conference gives me the opportunity to deal with various issues which relate to some of the problems facing my country.

Firstly, I would like to say that social and professional relations in Cape Verde have suffered greatly as a result of the changes which have occurred in the political, economic and social spheres.

The Cape Verde trade union movement to which the trade union confederation which I head, the National Union of Cape Verde Workers (UNTC-CS), belongs has obviously been affected by these changes, and it has had to face many serious problems, a number of which are known to the ILO.

In fact, in 1992 on the occasion of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, as well as in 1993 during the 80th Session, the UNTC-CS and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) lodged a protest with the ILO against the Cape Verde Government's designation for two years running of another Cape Verde trade union organization which is not represented at the national level.

With the intention of shedding light on the question of the trade union representation in Cape Verde, the UNTC-CS proposed that the Government carry out a survey, but unfortunately the Government has not yet given a favourable reply to this proposal.

Again in 1993 the UNTC-CS lodged a protest with the ILO against the Government for interference in its internal affairs.

Nevertheless, and despite successive recommendations of the Credentials Committee and the Committee on Freedom of Association, the situation is still the same today, although there have recently been some positive signs.

Cape Verde is a member of the group of African countries which have made the transition to democracy in peace and tranquillity without social unrest.

Even though the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87) of the ILO is not yet ratified, our country has a Constitution which is considered as one of the most modern and advanced, which enshrines the fundamental rights, freedoms and guarantees for citizens in general and workers in particular, especially the right to work and to job security, the right to freedom of association and the right to strike.

Ordinary laws exist, including laws concerning and regulating the exercise of freedom of association but these are in fact not respected.

This observation applies not only to trade union issues, but also to the economic, social and political spheres.

It can be inferred from the above that much of the information which the Government of Cape Verde communicates to the ILO concerning protests and complaints made by the UNTC-CS, is not true to life.

This being the case, it would be both useful and desirable for the ILO to send a mission to Cape Verde to observe, check and formulate conclusions on the true situation.

Authoritarian principles and practices, intolerance and social exclusion are now emerging and taking shape in Cape Verde, at the expense of social dialogue. This practice, as well as the serious and complex economic and social problems facing the country which require the participation of all through greater consensus amongst the principle actors of national life in all sectors of activity in order to be solved, are endangering Cape Verde's young and fragile democracy.

Unemployment is currently reaching disturbing levels; according to official sources the average is 26 per cent at the national level and over 30 per cent on certain islands. The average yearly growth of GDP in the last three years (1991-93) has been 3 per cent, whilst foreign debt has increased at a rate of US$5 million per year over the same period.
